Chapter 6: The parental order procedure

8 Consultation Question 1:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Crucial - there is already too many cases of deceit and exploitation. We have a moral duty to ensure the UK side is above reproach.

Please provide your views below:

9 Consultation Question 2:

Please provide your views below:

I would like to see them all allocated to judges - circuit in case of domestic.

10 Consultation Question 3: We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Chapter 8: Legal Parenthood: Proposals for Reform - A New Pathway

14 Consultation Question 7:

No

Please provide your views below:

This simply wouldn't be true; falsehoods should not be knowingly written onto birth certificates. Children have the right to know who their birth mother is. We should not change this. Mothers are not just living wombs to be hired out. Surrogates should retain the right to change their mind.

15 Consultation Question 8:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

There should be absolute transparency and accountability at every level

Another period

Please provide your views below:

Information should always be open - no time limit

16 Consultation Question 9: We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

All children have the right to know their genetic and familial history.

17 Consultation Question 10: We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

18 Consultation Question 11:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.Do consultees agree?

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

28 Consultation Question 21: We invite consultees' views as to: (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

Please provide your views below:

29 Consultation Question 22:

Please provide your views below:

The surrogacy business should be banned not made easier. There is no evidence in the proposed changes that the surrogacy business, which benefits Agencies, lawyers and those commissioning a surrogate (who is expected to carry a child as an altruistic act) should be made easier for those who profit. The evidence points to banning or severely restricting surrogacy practices as has been done in European countries such as Switzerland, France, Germany and Sweden and further afield in India and Thailand.

31 Consultation Question 24:

Please provide your views below:

It is remarkable given the years of current surrogacy enablement in UK that those involved are not, never have been, subject to Adoption and Child Act (ACA) 2002.

32 Consultation Question 25: We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

34 Consultation Question 27:

Not Answered

Please provide your views below:

I disagree with the provisional proposal that, where a child is born of a surrogacy arrangement, the Intended Parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the baby. This pathway will take no account of, and fails to recognise, the bond which is formed between mother and baby during and after the gestational period and the right of a child to know the identity of their birth mother.

This pathway will favour the Intended Parents and the removes the right of the child to have a biologically accurate birth record.

35 Consultation Question 28: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

38 Consultation Question 31: We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

Please provide your views below:

The views of independent surrogates are unlikely to be well represented, particularly overseas surrogates, mainly poor and uneducated and often exploited.

39 Consultation Question 32:

Please provide your views below:

Consultation is built on a pro-surrogacy bias. There is no hard evidence of the long term impact upon the child who is a surrogate or the mother who gave birth to them. The entitlement to 'found a family' has been reinterpreted to 'found a family=the right to have a child by surrogacy'. The consultation seems to accept that breaching surrogate women's human rights not to experience dehumanising practices is lost in the attempt to covertly enable baby buyers to 'found a family'.

Please provide your views below:

Children born of surrogacy arrangement, where there is or is not a genetic connection to the birth mother, should have access to all facts relating to their birth heritage and origins. A practice adoption agencies now recognise as key elements for children's rights, security and healthy maturity.

78 Consultation Question 70: We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

Absolutely. You don't fully understand pregnancy and birth until you have been through it. You need that experience in order to make a rational decision. Its also important because if surrogacy cost a woman her womb then she would not be able to have children of her own for herself.

79 Consultation Question 71: We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

Absolutely not - women are not baby-making machines. Before contraception was widely available, women died due to going through too many pregnancies. It should not become a job for low-paid, low-skilled women to be forced into through lack of choice.

Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

(1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

(2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

(1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and

(2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

(1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;

(2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or

(3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

(1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,

(2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and

(3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

1.12 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;

(2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and

(3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

(1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;

(2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and

(3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

(1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;

(2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and

(3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

(1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;

(2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and

(3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

(1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and

(2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Paragraph 8.77

Consultation Question 17.

1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

(1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:

(a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and

(b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or

(2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

(1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;

(2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and

(3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and

(2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

(1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and

(2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:

(a) administrative, or

(b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and

(2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

(1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and

(2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

1.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

(1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and

(2) they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

1.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

(1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and

(2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

1.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the 'intended parents' should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women's reproductive capacities.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

1.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

(2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.140

Consultation Question 30.

1.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

1.35 We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

N/A

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

1.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

1.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

1.38 We provisionally propose that:

(1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

(2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

(3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

1.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

(1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;

(2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;

(3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;

(4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and

(5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

1.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

1.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

1.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

1.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

1.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

1.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

1.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

1.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

1.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

1.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

1.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

1.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

1.55 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

1.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.57 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the register should be maintained by the Authority;

(2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:

(a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and

(b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and

(3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

1.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

1.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

(1) where his or her legal parents have consented;

(2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or

(3) in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

1.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

1.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

1.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

(1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or

(2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

1.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

1.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

1.67 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

(2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:

(a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or

(b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and

(3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

1.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

1.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

1.70 We invite consultees' views on whether:

(1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or

(2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

1.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

1.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

(1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but

(2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

1.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 12.64

Consultation Question 60.

1.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

1.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

1.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

(1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or

(2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.78 We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

1.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

1.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

(1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or

(2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

1.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

1.82 We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.83 We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood.

I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.84 We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

1.85 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

1.86 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for a 'new pathway'. At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

1.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

1.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

(1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and

(2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

1.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

1.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

(1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;

(2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and

(3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

1.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

1.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

1.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

(1) based on an allowance;

(2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or

(3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

1.96 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and

(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

1.97 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and

(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

1.98 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and

(2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.29

Consultation Question 76.

1.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

1.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

(1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or

(2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

1.101 We invite consultees to share their experiences:

(1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and

(2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

1.102 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

(1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;

(2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or

(3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

It is absurd to propose that one could place a monetary value on the pain of adverse pregnancy outcomes. In putting a price tag on perineal tear for example, some mothers report little pain or symptoms, others have profound ongoing fear of vaginal penetration, which can result in very significant emotional and relationship difficulties. Infection may complicate healing, and some women report long term sequelae from this, such as impaired wound healing.

Haematology conditions should also be considered. Blood loss, for example due to placental haemorrhage can be very significant, and potentially result in emergency hysterectomy and blood transfusion to save the life of the mother. It is a fact that although blood is thoroughly screened in the UK there still remains the potential for blood borne illnesses to be transmitted, and the fact that some of these may not have been identified yet by researchers is also a real risk to a mother receiving transfusion. Persons who have had a blood transfusion are currently unable to donate blood themselves in the UK, due to the risk of (vCJD) transmission. This is an indication of the gravity of receiving blood products.

No medical intervention is EVER risk free. Receiving multiple blood products in the context of Massive Transfusion Protocol (eg platelets, Fresh Frozen Plasma, cryoprecipitate) only heighten those risks.

Conditions such as HELLP (Haemolysis, Elevated Liver enzymes, Low Platelets) can be fatal, and although the maternal mortality rate is low, it can have significant sequelae, including renal failure potentially requiring dialysis, placental abruption (potentially fatal for mother and baby) permanent liver damage and retinal detachment resulting in visual impairment.

Each of these conditions have long term consequences for a woman, psychologically, physically and emotionally, and may also affect her ability to return to work or care for other children.

Also, the late complications of childbirth have been disregarded. Late consequences of childbirth can include vaginal or rectal prolapse, urinary and faecal incontinence. Women who have had a C section may experience ongoing pain around the scar. Some sources quote this as affecting between 6 and 18 percent of women. These symptoms can be profoundly distressing, and may take years to present (conversely, may present immediately).

How could we ensure that women suffering these complications are compensated? They are multifactorial, and risk increases with instrumented delivery and parity. How would it be proposed to unpick the role of a surrogate pregnancy in causing these symptoms in relation to other risk factors, for example parity, smoking history, personal medical history?

Psychiatric conditions are also absent from this list. Complications including depression and anxiety may be worsened by pregnancy. Other mental health conditions such as post natal depression and post partum psychosis can be fatal, and impact on a woman's health for many years to come. I'm quite shocked that none of these conditions have been explicitly mentioned and it does make me wonder how the list of complications was created. I'd also like to know what level of haemorrhage would be considered "excessive".

The wording of the question "should" be able to pay compensation is not the same as being mandated to do so. This potentially creates a situation where some "luckier" women would receive compensation others would not.

All of the above illustrates the risks of surrogacy and confirms my support for a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.103 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.104 We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

(1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or

(2) left to the parties to negotiate.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

1.105 We invite consultees views' as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

1.106 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

(1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and

(2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

1.107 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.108 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

(1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or

(2) a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.109 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

(1) no other payments;

(2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;

(3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy;

(4) lost earnings;

(5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or

(6) gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to make any type of fee or payment to the birth mother for her 'services'.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

1.110 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

1.111 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

(1) in the first trimester of pregnancy only;

(2) to any miscarriage or termination; or

(3) some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

1.112 We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Paragraph 15.74

Consultation Question 85.

1.113 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

1.114 We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

1.115 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

(1) for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and

(2) for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

1.116 We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.117 We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

1.120 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

1.121 We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

1.122 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

1.123 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

1.124 We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

1.125 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or

(2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.126 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

1.127 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.76

Consultation Question 96.

1.128 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

1.129 We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

1.130 We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

1.131 We provisionally propose that:

1.132 the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but

1.133 before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

1.134 We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

1.135 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

(1) any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and

(2) if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

1.136 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

1.137 We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

1.138 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and

(2) if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

1.139 We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

1.140 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

1.141 We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

1.142 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself.

There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

At a time when the NHS is under severe strain, and life changing therapies (for cancer, cystic fibrosis etc) are not funded due to financial constraints it is a slap in the face to provide money for prospective parents to indulge their parenting fantasies while denying patients access to drugs which are standard of care in other counties.

1.143 We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

1.144 We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

1.145 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Paragraph 17.80

Consultation Question 109.

1.146 We invite consultees who are intended parents, live in the UK, and have entered into a surrogacy arrangement that led to the birth of a child to tell us:

(1) when the child was born;

(2) whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;

(3) whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and

(4) whether they are a:

(a) opposite-sex couple;

(b) male same-sex couple;

(c) female same-sex couple;

(d) single woman; or

(e) single man.

Paragraph 18.2

Consultation Question 110.

1.147 We invite consultees who have experience of applying for a parental order in the UK to tell us:

(1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;

(2) whether they had legal advice before the making of the parental order;

(3) whether they were represented by a lawyer in court; and

(4) the cost of any legal advice or representation.

Paragraph 18.4

Consultation Question 111.

1.148 We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 18.6

Consultation Question 112.

1.149 We invite consultees to tell us what they have paid for, or to provide evidence about the cost of:

(1) medical screening; and

(2) implications counselling

Consultation Question 113.

1.151 We invite consultees to tell us of the impact of:

(1) the current requirement of a genetic link; and

(2) any removal of this requirement in cases of medical necessity:

(a) in the new pathway;

(b) in the parental order route for domestic surrogacy arrangements; or

(c) in both situations.

Paragraph 18.11

Consultation Question 114.

1.152 We invite consultees who consider that they might be able to fulfil the role of the independent professional discussed in Chapter 9 to tell us:

(1) their profession; and

(2) what they would charge to provide such a service.

Paragraph 18.15

Consultation Question 116.

1.155 We ask consultees who are intended parents to tell us:

(1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;

(2) what they spent, in total, on the surrogacy arrangement(s) that led to the birth of their child(ren), including the cost of fertility treatment, payments to the surrogate and payments to any surrogacy agency or organisation;

(3) how they raised the funds for the surrogacy arrangement(s);

(4) what they spent on any fertility treatment prior to entering into a surrogacy arrangement (where that treatment did not lead to the birth of a child); and

(5) how they raised the funds for the fertility treatment.

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

1.156 We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

1.157 We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Your Response to Q46 There are currently no guidelines for healthcare professionals in Northern Ireland. This must be addressed. While not the responsibility of this consulting body, with the absence of a devolved government healthcare professionals have been left in a vaccum with the guidelines for England and Wales to use as reference only.
The follow up care for the surrogate must be accommodated as well as for the child. There may need to be an update to record keeping and systems to allow for both to be properly cared for.
Midwives have asked Here NI organisation for guidance as they had not received any from the Department of Health and had an incoming paitent who was a surrogate, this is not an ideal situation. Midwives raised concerns around who was allowed to attend the birth, who could make decisions, who could take the baby from the hospital, and around breastfeeding.
The new pathway may go some way to provide clarity on these issues, but not for births to surrogagtes in Northern Ireland.

116 Consultation Question 108: We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

Short Form Questionnaire: Law Commissions' Surrogacy Consultation

This form is an extract of the longer form for comments and responses to the Law Commission's and the Scottish Law Commission's consultation about reforming surrogacy law. If you would like to respond to the full version of our consultation questionnaire, please use the online form: https://consult.justice.gov.uk/law-commission/surrogacy. Please see our websites for further details, and for links to download the full consultation paper: https://www.lawcom.gov.uk/project/surrogacy/ and https://www.scotlawcom.gov.uk/law-reform/law-reform-projects/joint-projects/surrogacy/.

We have selected 46 questions which may be of particular interest of those with lived experience of surrogacy arrangements: surrogates, intended parents, family members and adult children born of surrogacy arrangements. You do not need to answer all the questions if you do not want to, and you can write as much or as little as you would like in response to our questions.

Please note that we may publish or disclose information you provide us in response to this consultation, including personal information. We ask consultees, when providing their responses, if they could avoid including personal identifying information in the text of their response, particularly where this may reveal the identities of other people involved in their surrogacy arrangement.

For more information about how we consult and how we may use responses to the consultation, please see page i – ii of the Consultation Paper.

HOW TO SUBMIT YOUR RESPONSE USING THIS QUESTIONNAIRE

Type your response into the text fields below and then save your completed form. When you have completed your response, email the completed form as an attachment to surrogacy@lawcommission.gov.uk.

The closing date for submitting a response to our consultation is 11 October 2019.

Question No.	Consultation Question
Q1	Consultation Question 7. In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have: (1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth, (2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and (3) met eligibility requirements, on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q1	As someone who has a daughter through a surrogacy arrangement that was set up over 22 years (my daughter is 21) through COTS that has been highly successful I am apprehensive about providing a legal framework that is so rigid that it deters potential surrogates from coming forward. I appreciate that not all surrogacy journeys are as successful as our own but part of the success has been through building trust and confidence by personal interactions rather than via predetermined legal hoops which all involved have to pass through. It is stressful enough to enter into any 'assisted conception' arrangement, for both intended parents who have probably been on the journey for many years and surrogates who, perhaps, may have somewhat mixed experience of formal procedures. The new pathway to legal parenthood is fraught with challenges that makes me deeply uneasy. It looks like something established by lawyers to protect against those surrogacy arrangements that have gone awry when, in truth, the majority of them do not. It does not have the feel of a pragmatic arrangement mediated through experience of the process and may lead to many intended couples and surrogates choosing to avoid the formalities of a constrained UK system and opting for a more relaxed process elsewhere. It may be attractive to those intended couples who would like to view the process as a type of 'medical intervention' rather than an arrangement between, often fragile human beings (the intended parents) who just want to work with truely altruistic individuals (the surrogate and their partners) who want to help.

Q2	Consultation Question 11. We provisionally propose that: (1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child; (2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and (3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q2	Not sure that I see a problem with the current arrangement through a parental order where both parties have the time and space to decide how they want to progress the arrangement and formalise the outcome. A child is not a piece of merchandise where ownership can be decided on the basis of genetics or a legal framework with amoney back guarantee.
Q3	Consultation Question 12. We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that: (1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child; (2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and (3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q3	Retain the parental order route.

Q4	Consultation Question 15. We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.
Your Response to Q4	Agreed but this inevitably takes you down the route of DNA identification, in the case of host surrogacy' to ensure that the spouse is not the biological father. This is fraught with complications and should be avoided.
Q5	Consultation Question 27. We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway: (1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and (2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q5	This is OK.
Q6	Consultation Question 28. We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q6	Agreed.
Q7	Consultation Question 29. For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

	(2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.
Your Response to Q7	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q8	Consultation Question 55. We provisionally propose that: (1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available; (2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances: (a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or (b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and (3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q8	This is a legal issue that you now are caught up in by imposing a legal framework. This is potentially a deleterious step and should be avoided.
Q9	Consultation Question 30. We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q9	No. The proposed pathway needs to be re-evaluated by individuals who have direct experience of surrogacy not be those who see it as an issue that requires a legal framework to wrapped around it.
Q10	Consultation Question 32. We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway. We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

Your Response to Q10	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q11	Consultation Question 67. We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway: (1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and (2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q11	No
Q12	Consultation Question 68. We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q12	The consequence of this is that you will reduce the number of individuals who wish to embark on surrogacy. It is not a journey that should should start with the signing of a legal agreement.
Q13	Consultation Question 88. We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q13	Another potential minefield! I recognise that there is a need for a financial 'agreement' but it has to be entered into extremely carfully and with accommodation on both sides. I am more in favour of the intending couples to provide support to the surrogate so that they can choose to give up their work at some stage in the pregacy and also to enable them to recover after birth has taken place.
Q14	Consultation Question 42.

	We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q14	agreed
Q15	Consultation Question 62. We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity: (1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or (2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made. We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.
Your Response to Q15	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q16	Consultation Question 70. We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.
Your Response to Q16	This is understandable and I suspect is the norm but not sure why it would be made a requirement particularly in view of the legal framework that is being proposed.
Q17	Consultation Question 33. We provisionally propose that: (1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations; (2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and (3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q17	1 and 2 seem to contradictory.
Q18	Consultation Question 35. We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

	Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q18	They should have charitable status.
Q19	Consultation Question 37. We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.
Your Response to Q19	Agreed
Q20	Consultation Question 59. We provisionally propose that the new pathway – (1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but (2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements. We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q20	Agreed
Q21	Consultation Question 46. We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings. Do consultees agree?

Your Response to Q21	Agreed
Q22	Consultation Question 47. We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that: (1) the register should be maintained by the Authority; (2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include: (a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and (b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and (3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q22	This will work for those surrogacy arrangements that occur through IVF clinics but again brings DNA testing of surrogates into the equation for host surrogacy arrangements.
Q23	Consultation Question 48. We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.
Your Response to Q23	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q24	Consultation Question 49. We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request. Do consultees agree?

	We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances: (1) where his or her legal parents have consented; (2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or (3) in any other circumstances.
Q25	Consultation Question 51. We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.
Your Response to Q25	The danger in this is that pandora's box may be opened. We are moving down a path of making surrogacy a mechanical process involving the mixing of DNA and the identification of genetic outcomes.This should be avoided. We need to remember that surrogates and intended couples are people and that the child who is born out of such an arragments has both elements that originate from nature and nurture.
Q26	Consultation Question 52. We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so: (1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or (2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.
Your Response to Q26	See above.
Q27	Consultation Question 53. For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.
Your Response to Q27	If outside the pathway why impose the pathway rules and regulations?

Q28	Consultation Question 72. We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be: (1) based on an allowance; (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.
Your Response to Q28	Based on an allowance previously discussed. The idea of the surrogate having to produce receipts is abhorrent!
Q29	Consultation Question 73. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".
Your Response to Q29	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q30	Consultation Question 74. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.
Your Response to Q30	Additionalis fine. Leave it to the parties to work out.
Q31	Consultation Question 75. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and (2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.
Your Response to Q31	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q32	Consultation Question 76.

	We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).
Your Response to Q32	This would be the preferred option
Q33	Consultation Question 77. We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings: (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).
Your Response to Q33	Agreed.
Q34	Consultation Question 78. We invite consultees to share their experiences: (1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and (2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.
Your Response to Q34	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q35	Consultation Question 79. We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following: (1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth; (2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or (3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

	We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation. We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be: (1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or (2) left to the parties to negotiate.
Your Response to Q35	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q36	Consultation Question 80. We invite consultees views' as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.
Your Response to Q36	Understand the issue here but we are turning this whole process from a personal relationship into a legal transaction. This is absolutely the wrong direction of travel!
Q37	Consultation Question 81. We invite consultees' views as to whether: (1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and (2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.
Your Response to Q37	What a bizarre question! Is this before the birth or after the birth? Does it include birthday presents? There are important issues in this document and this question is in danger of trivialising the whole consultation process.
Q38	Consultation Question 82. We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be: (1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or (2) a fixed fee set by the regulator. We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee: (1) no other payments; (2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;

	(3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy; (4) lost earnings; (5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or (6) gifts.
Your Response to Q38	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q39	Consultation Question 84. We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q39	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q40	Consultation Question 85. We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.
Your Response to Q40	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q41	Consultation Question 92. We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q41	I have no experience of international surrogacy and do not feel that I can useful contribute to this part of the consultation exercise.
Q42	Consultation Question 94. We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth. Do consultees agree?

	We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that: (1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or (2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.
Your Response to Q42	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q43	Consultation Question 95. We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q43	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q44	Consultation Question 97. We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q44	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q45	Consultation Question 99. We provisionally propose that: the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law. Do consultees agree?

Your Response to Q45	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q46	Consultation Question 107. We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area. We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales. We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

Chapter 6: The parental order procedure

8 Consultation Question 1:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We think international surrogacy cases should remain heard by High Court judges who have the expertise to deal with them properly and efficiently:

• The High Court judges who hear international surrogacy cases have developed significant experience, and deal with cases efficiently. We have seen a few (3 or 4) international surrogacy cases mistakenly allocated to circuit judges and our experience has been consistently very poor:
o In one involving an Indian surrogacy, the court made the wrong order (a parental responsibility order instead of a parental order) and this was not identified by self-representing applicants until they sought legal advice several years later.
o In a more recent US surrogacy case involving a single father (which had been properly issued within six months of s54A coming into effect) the applicant was wrongly told he was out of time and a hearing before a circuit judge was listed to consider whether his application could proceed at all.

• Many applicants for parental orders are unrepresented and mistakes of this kind cause unnecessary delay and may even have lifelong implications for the child.

• Significant training will be needed if the current allocation is changed. Given the relatively small number of international surrogacy cases, this does not seem justified.

• If the Secretary of State exercises the proposed power to recognise some jurisdictions there will be fewer parental orders heard in international surrogacy cases, and those that remain will be those which most need careful judicial oversight.

• We have also made additional proposals in this response as to:
o how the current parental order process could be re-designed to streamline it (please see our response to Question 108); and o how some international surrogacy cases could be brought within the proposed pathway (see our response to Question 98) .
If these proposals are adopted, this will further reduce the burden on High Court judges.

Please see (1) above.

9 Consultation Question 2:

Please provide your views below:

We think that domestic surrogacy cases in which there is a dispute should continue to be heard by High Court judges, and that domestic surrogacy cases in which there is no dispute should be heard by sufficiently-qualified judges (which at the moment we think only includes High Court judges):

• The current allocation rules say that domestic surrogacy cases in which there is an issue over consent should be heard by circuit judges, and those in which there is no dispute should be heard by lay magistrates. However, this is not a true reflection of what happens in practice.

• Disputed cases are always heard by High Court judges (this has been the case for every surrogacy case we have been involved in, and every reported case of which we are aware). These are complex cases appropriate to be heard by High Court judges, who have significant experience and expertise. We think this should be properly reflected in the allocation rules to ensure cases are transferred efficiently without unnecessary preliminary hearings to consider allocation.

• Undisputed domestic parental order applications are currently heard by lay magistrates. The Central Family Court in London has good experience and manages cases efficiently (with a single final hearing after directions are issued automatically in writing) and this typically takes 4-6 months with legal representation or 6-9 months without. Elsewhere there are usually two court hearings in the magistrates' court, and experience is variable, but applications often take longer (6-15 months). The advantage of magistrate allocation is that the process is largely administrative. However, the disadvantage is that the process is lengthy and there is very little legal scrutiny (something which has created the confusion and flexibility over expenses and led to lack of interrogation of other criteria such as domicile - see Re G (surrogacy: foreign domicile) [2007]).

• Given that parental orders will only apply to UK surrogacy cases going forward which fall outside the pathway, and given the intention for there to be meaningful judicial oversight of such cases, we think they should be heard by more senior judges. For the reasons set out in our response to Question 1 (concerning expertise, efficiency and avoiding delay) we think that High Court judges are currently the only judges with the experience and expertise to do this.

• We also think that the current parental order process should be significantly re-designed to update and simplify it, which will reduce the burden on the court (please see our response to Question 108).

10 Consultation Question 3: We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

11 Consultation Question 4:

Other

Please provide your views below:

If there is a first directions hearing and the intended parents do not already have parental responsibility, then we agree that the court should be required to consider granting it on an interim basis. This reflects what the court routinely does in practice in any event (certainly in the High Court).
However, we also think that the limbo period in which intended parents are caring for their child without parental responsibility/legal parenthood should be minimised, to ensure parents and children are treated no differently from other families as far as possible:
• We therefore agree with the Law Commission's provisional proposal that intended parents acquire parental responsibility automatically from birth where they propose to apply for a parental order (see our response to Question 26).

• We do not think there should routinely be a directions hearing in parental order applications, and that cases should be fully resolved in one hearing wherever possible so that interim orders are not needed (see our response to Question 108).

12 Consultation Question 5: We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the Family Procedure Rules 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

We think that the current parental order process should be significantly re-designed to update and simplify it (please see our response to Question 108). In line with this, we do not think that the default rule should be a full CAFCASS report. However, where there is one we agree that it (as well as any lighter touch safeguarding report) should be disclosed to the applicants automatically.

We have been involved in several hearings where the court has expressed its frustration to a CAFCASS officer for not disclosing their report, even though this is what the rules say. A change to the rules is therefore sensible.

Chapter 8: Legal Parenthood: Proposals for Reform - A New Pathway

14 Consultation Question 7:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree that intended parents should be recognised as the legal parents of their child from birth:

• This reflects what a surrogacy arrangement is – a shared intention to conceive a child who will be the child of the parents and not the surrogate.

• It will bring UK surrogacy law better in line with other forms of assisted reproduction, such as egg and sperm donation, where the intended parents are recognised as the parents from birth.

• It will create greater confidence in UK surrogacy as a legitimate and legally-recognised process, which we hope will both encourage parents to stay in the UK and encourage more UK surrogates to come forward.

• It is in the best interests of the child. Currently children born through surrogacy are born into a legal limbo. During the 6-12 month period it takes to transfer legal responsibility, real difficulties arise, including around decision-making in relation to hospital post-natal care (where we have seen parents ignored or excluded), unnecessary referrals to social services (with parents and surrogates made to feel they are doing something wrong in allowing the parents to care for their own child). The child is vulnerable from insecure parentage having, for example, no automatic inheritance rights and no rights to financial maintenance if a parent leaves. Perhaps even more importantly, the limbo period creates significant emotional vulnerability for all involved which may impact on bonding and attachment.

• Of the Brilliant Beginnings surrogates and intended parents we consulted, all were strongly supportive of legal parenthood from birth:

o One father (who had an 8 month old son and was awaiting his parental order) said that they felt that this was 'hanging over them', and said their surrogate and her spouse were becoming more and more anxious about the risk of them being asked to make decisions in respect of a child who was not theirs.
o Another parent said in retrospect: "It felt strange to do this after the fact. You are correcting something that is factually wrong, and are in the hands of social services and could be bumped, so there is anxiety and feeling that you are not being trusted".
o Another parent discussed having to hold back from applying for a passport until the parental order was granted (because they didn't want to ask their surrogate to apply), which meant that their child couldn't be taken to meet her grandparents who lived overseas.
o One two-time surrogate said: "Surrogates do not want to be the mother and do not want to make decisions after the baby is born".
o Another surrogate described how her husband was initially very reluctant because of legal parenthood. She said "He just couldn't understand how it all worked and felt very protective" and said that as a result they nearly didn't do it. She thought this would have been a much easier decision if the birth certificate could be agreed in advance.

We agree with the proposed pre-pregnancy steps:

• The proposed requirements are sensible minimum safeguards to protect all parties going into a surrogacy arrangement and the child to be conceived. They provide a framework to mitigate against unnecessary complications.

• They are broadly in line with existing customary practice around UK surrogacy, and so will not add significantly to the financial or practical burden of intended parents or surrogates.

We do not agree that the surrogate should have a right to object to legal parenthood (see our response to Question 11).

15 Consultation Question 8:

Other

Please provide your views below:

We think this question conflates two separate issues: firstly, who can confirm that a surrogacy arrangement complies with the pathway requirements, and secondly what responsibilities regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should have for retaining records.

We think that only licensed surrogacy organisations should be able to confirm that the requirements of the pathway have been met for the purposes of legal parenthood:

• We see the role of a licensed surrogacy organisation as being to pull together the threads of safeguarding steps provided by other professionals (legal advice, implications counselling, medical screening) and in addition to carry out its own unique role in respect of ensuring eligibility, carrying out background checks, assessing the welfare of the child and ensuring that the written agreement covers all important issues. We do not think that fertility clinics automatically have the skills and experience to carry out this function properly in surrogacy cases.

• We think there should be a separate HFEA licence for surrogacy and that, if fertility clinics want to carry out the role of confirming that a surrogacy arrangement meets the pathway requirements, they should hold an HFEA surrogacy licence to enable them to do so, and so be subject to the same regulatory control as surrogacy organisations.

• We are mindful of the extensive body of case law concerning the failure of fertility clinics to properly oversee the establishment of parenthood in sperm donation cases (started with the 'Alphabet' case heard by Munby P in 2015). These difficulties have arisen because the oversight of legal parenthood was left to clinical professionals under HFEA licence who did not have the skills and experience to carry out this role properly. However, in sperm donation cases legal parenthood is established by completing and signing two consent forms. In a surrogacy case, the process for establishing legal parenthood will involve many different steps. Given that complexity of this, we do not think licensed clinics should be given this responsibility unless willing to comply with a surrogacy licence.

• In consulting Brilliant Beginnings parents and surrogates about this, there was a very low level of confidence in fertility clinics' understanding and management of surrogacy generally. One parent said: "The whole process is complex and clinics are just not set up to deal with it."

In respect of record keeping, we agree that regulated surrogacy organisations (in respect of the surrogacy aspects) and licensed clinics (in respect of treatment and donation) should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements they have facilitated, but only until the birth is registered. After this, we believe all significant information should be held on the HFEA register of information and the national surrogacy register:

• It is better for surrogate-born people to be able to access information about their genetic and gestational heritage from a central public register. This protects their rights, ensures that information is held consistently and in one place, and means that they do not necessarily need to know the organisation or clinic involved in their conception. This is in line with the existing system for donor-conceived people accessing information about their donors, which is done via the HFEA Register of Information rather than through records held by individual clinics.

• It is not practical to require private surrogacy organisations/fertility clinics to maintain records for 100 years. It is also an onerous responsibility for non-profit organisations, some of which are run with a very limited budget, and there are no guarantees the organisations will even exist in 100 years' time.

• A central register will enable sensitive and consistent procedures for managing requests to access information, for example through the provision of counselling.

See above (15).

16 Consultation Question 9: We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

We do not think this is necessary and do not really understand the reason for the question since it doesn't deal with any real issue we have ever seen:

• The only donated gametes used in a traditional surrogacy arrangement (since the surrogate is using her own eggs) are sperm. We have never seen a traditional surrogacy case where the intended father's sperm was not used, but even if donated sperm was used sperm donors at UK clinics are always identifiable and anonymous donor sperm cannot be imported to the UK without a breach of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act by the recipient. We therefore do not see how it would even be possible to use anonymously-donated sperm in traditional surrogacy, unless it involved treatment with donor sperm at a clinic outside the UK.

• We do see anonymously-donated gametes (usually eggs rather than sperm) being used in gestational surrogacy cases where the IVF treatment takes place overseas as part of an international surrogacy arrangement. In some countries (the Ukraine, Georgia, India) anonymous egg donors are the only option, in other countries (the USA, Canada) intended parents have the option to choose an anonymous, known or semi-known donor. We also see the use of anonymously-donated gametes in some domestic surrogacy cases, where a UK surrogate is taken overseas for IVF/donor egg treatment, usually to somewhere in Europe (Cyprus, Spain, Czech Republic). This may be because the intended parents have embryos left over from previous treatment and/or because they are seeking cheaper IVF/egg donation.

17 Consultation Question 10: We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

See response to Question 9.

18 Consultation Question 11:

No

Please provide your views below:

We do not agree that the surrogate should have a post-birth right to object to legal parenthood in the new pathway:

• We have given this proposal significant thought in view of the Law Commission's apparent acceptance that surrogates need a post-birth right to decide whether to surrender their birth status so as not to breach their rights, as well as our confidence that any objection would very rarely – and likely even never - be exercised in practice.

• However, we had strong feedback from every single Brilliant Beginnings surrogate we spoke to that surrogates should not be given a right to object in the new pathway, as this is not something that they have asked for or want. We support them, and feel that this goes to the core of what a surrogacy arrangement is: the conception of a child on the basis of a shared intention that the intended parents will be the child's legal parents. Fundamentally, we do not believe that a woman who has given informed consent to carrying a child for someone else is ever that child's legal mother. We think the current proposals perpetuate the misunderstanding about the nature of surrogacy, and about the lack of capacity of women to confidently commit to carrying someone else's child.

• To give a flavour of the strength of feedback from our surrogates on this, here are some of their comments (and please note that this was not balanced with a single conflicting view):
o "No. I have made my decision and I made them at the beginning, so no. I am actually quite insulted by this."
o "I have exercised a right from the beginning to be a surrogate so I don't need to be given a right that I haven't asked for."
o "This is about re-educating people about what surrogacy is – it is not adoption."
o "If we apply the pre birth stuff, why would you need this?".
o "The countless months of IVF, the months developing a close and personal bond with IPs and to have their health and the child's health taken care of by those IPs, only for the surrogate to say 'I want to keep the child' I think is harsh. Yes everyone has the freedom of choice and every woman has that choice, however I don't believe anyone should enter a surrogacy with the slightest slither of doubt in their mind that they will allow the IPs to become the legal parents of that child."
o "No I don't think that surrogates should be able to change their minds and keep the baby. They have entered into a surrogacy agreement knowing from the beginning that they are carrying a child for another couple."
o Our surrogates were also, when pressed, collectively unable to think of any possible circumstances in which they thought it would be justified for a surrogate to change her mind and claim legal motherhood.

• Since the pre-conception steps in the new pathway are designed to protect surrogates and ensure informed consent (through counselling, screening and independent legal advice), we think that they should create a legally binding decision for the surrogate in respect of who the child's legal parents are. A surrogate should be treated similarly to an egg donor who, despite remaining a biological parent, has no right following conception to change her mind and claim she is the legal mother.

• Cases in which a UK surrogate seeks to keep the baby (or objects to parenthood without wishing to care for the baby) are very rare, contrary to popular misconception. Having dealt with over 1,000 surrogacy cases, we have only been involved in a tiny number of disputed UK surrogacy cases (H v S (2015) and 2 others, one of which was resolved and one which is currently in process). In H v S (2015) the court found that the surrogate had actively misled the parents about her intentions from the outset, rather than changing her mind. The other two cases we have been involved in involved independent surrogacies in which sensible pre-conception steps were not followed and there was a breakdown in communication. There is, to the best of our knowledge, not a single reported or unreported case in which a UK surrogate has simply changed her mind having gone through a process equivalent to the proposed pathway pre-conception. We therefore do not think there is a real need to give surrogates a right to object.

• In respect of international law and women's rights issues we think it is also important, conceptually, to separate the concept of legal parenthood from the wider concept of the 'rights' of surrogates in relation to the child. A surrogate can (like anyone else), under English law, apply to the family court for a child arrangements order which gives her a right contact with the child, or even to have the child live with her, and the family court would consider what was in the child's best interests. Removing her power to object to legal parenthood therefore does not remove her 'rights' in relation to the child. None of the proposals made by the Law Commission would prevent her from bringing an application to the family court for contact or even to have the child live with her. In an extreme case (perhaps most likely where the parents had abandoned the child or the child had been removed from their care for child protection reasons), a surrogate could even apply to adopt a child of whom she was not a legal parent. These remedies are sufficient to safeguard surrogates' rights, although we think that, to recognise a surrogate's special status a surrogate should be explicitly included in the categories of people who can apply for a child arrangements order without the court's leave.

• From the intended parents' perspective, the current proposal does not give enough certainty. Fundamentally, it does not change the current legal framework. One intended parent we consulted questioned the point of changing the law at all if the surrogate still had a right to change her mind. Even if a surrogate would be incredibly unlikely to exercise her right to object, it is important to understand the enormous impact the perceived risk has on parents' decision-making. We know, both from our own experience and from the research we carried out with Cambridge University (V Jadva, H Prosser and N Gamble, Cross-border and domestic surrogacy in the UK context: an exploration of practical and legal decision-making, Human Fertility, December 2018), that the desire for legal certainty is one of the primary factors driving intended parents overseas. If law reform hopes to encourage parents to enter into safe regulated UK surrogacy arrangements rather than going abroad, retaining the surrogate's post-birth veto will not achieve that.

If the Law Commission disagrees and the surrogate is given a right to object to legal parenthood, we think that – to avoid a delay in birth registration - it should be possible to register the birth with the surrogate's positive consent via her attending the birth registration or providing a statutory declaration:

• We believe that surrogates can make an informed decision to give consent without needing a 35 day cooling off period.

• This will enable the child's birth to be registered as soon as possible in cases where there is no dispute. If the current proposal is adopted, the intended parents will, in every surrogacy case, be forced to wait 35 days (in England) before they can register their child's birth. The current proposal will also create a very short window of time during which the intended parents must register the birth (only one week), which seems impractical.

• The current proposal effectively retains the 'limbo period', albeit over a shorter period. Intended parents will remain anxious about the risk of the surrogate changing her mind during that 35 day period (something which may work to undermine their longer-term relationship). Professionals will remain confused about who can make decisions for the child, during the potentially most critical post-natal period. One of the intended parents we consulted commented that this period of uncertainty would impact "at their most vulnerable time". It would be better to enable this unsatisfactory period of time to be brought to an end as quickly as possible.

19 Consultation Question 12:

No

Please provide your views below:

We do not agree. As set out in our response to Question 11, we do not think the surrogate should have a right to object post-birth at all. However, if the Law Commission disagrees, we think the right to object should only operate to trigger a court process rather than to make her the legal mother:

• The intended parents should be the legal parents on the basis of having complied with the pathway steps, and should be registered as such following the birth.

• If the surrogate does not consent to the birth registration this should trigger an application for a parental order, through which the family court can decide whether to: o make a confirmatory parental order in favour of the intended parents; or o decline a confirmatory parental order, in which case the surrogate will become the legal mother and the birth certificate will be re issued.

• The court can (separately from the question of legal parenthood, although likely within the same court process) also consider who the child should live with, spend time with, and who should have parental responsibility under the child arrangements order framework. As set out in our response to Question 11, we think surrogates should be entitled to apply for a child arrangements order without leave.

• Although not as good a solution as removing the surrogate's right to object entirely, we think this would be a better balancing of the rights of all involved than the current proposal. In particular, we think this would give greater certainty to intended parents since only the court, and not the surrogate, would be able to remove their legal parenthood if they have properly followed the pathway steps.

20 Consultation Question 13:

No

Please provide your views below:

We do not agree, since we do not think the surrogate should have a right to object post-birth. However, if the Law Commission disagrees and concludes the surrogate should have a right to object, we think that it is simpler and more practical to require the surrogate to positively consent to the birth registration, as set out in our response to Question 12. Question 13 is then irrelevant.

If the surrogate is unable to positively consent due to incapacity, the case should be treated in the same way as a case where she objects: the intended parents should be registered on the birth certificate but the surrogate's lack of consent should trigger a court process for a confirmatory parental order, as set out in Question 12. If the surrogate later recovers capacity, she can ask the court to make a parental order by consent, and so bring the court process to an end.

21 Consultation Question 14:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree. A light-touch pre conception welfare assessment is appropriate and sufficient, avoids discrimination and will be more effective than the current system in safeguarding the welfare of the child. We also think that, where a parental order is required, the welfare assessment should be lighter touch than is currently the case (see our response to Question 108):

• Surrogacy is a form of assisted reproduction, and the welfare assessment should not be modelled on adoption where a child born into one family is placed with another.

• There is no advance welfare assessment carried out on parents who conceive children naturally and a light-touch welfare of the child assessment in respect of parents who conceive at UK licensed fertility clinics. Over the years, this assessment has (appropriately) become increasingly more light-touch, recognising that fertility clinicians have limited ability to assess prospective parenting capacity and can therefore only look at safety and risk, and recognising that intended parents who suffer infertility should not be discriminated against.

• Parents who need the help of a surrogate either suffer from infertility or medical conditions or are in a family structure which makes it impossible for them to carry a pregnancy. There is no evidence that they are more likely to pose a risk than any other parents who choose to conceive children. There is therefore no justification for a higher level of scrutiny to be imposed in respect of their parenting capacity. If issues arise after the birth, parents through surrogacy will – like all other parents – be subject to the usual child protection systems.

• Post-birth welfare assessments are ineffective in surrogacy cases. Of the 1000+ surrogacy cases we have been involved in, only one has raised a significant welfare question concerning the suitability of the parents. In that case, the judge made a parental order and said that he would have done so even if he thought the welfare issues were so significant that they should trigger public law proceedings since the parents (rather than the surrogate and her husband) should have the right to be involved in those proceedings. This demonstrates how little impact the full welfare assessments actually have on the outcome of parental order applications, given that welfare is assessed through the rear-view mirror.

• Contrary to some views expressed about the importance of post-birth welfare assessments, replacing a post-birth welfare assessment with a pre-conception assessment will therefore not just have no detrimental impact on children; it will actually be more effective since it may prevent the surrogacy from ever taking place. However, it is also appropriate for this assessment to be as light touch as possible – ruling out only the most obvious and seriously unsuitable intended parents – given the risk of discrimination.

We have the following thoughts about how this should work in practice:

• We think the regulatory guidance should be modelled on the existing HFEA Code of Practice but should be particular to surrogacy. It should encompass both the intended parents and the surrogate/her partner if it takes place at a pre-conception stage, and not just the intended parents (as is currently the case in the post-birth assessment).

• Regulated surrogacy organisations should be given authority, if they wish, to conduct relevant enquiries (with the parties' consent), including criminal records checks and searches of local authorities to check if the parties are known to social services. At Brilliant Beginnings we have had a number of surrogates who have disclosed dealings with social services and we have not been permitted to obtain any information to verify whether that raises any concerns for the welfare of the child. We would like to be able to access this information ourselves (as CAFCASS currently does) in respect of both surrogate and intended parents, and think that the licensing system can be used to enable that.

22 Consultation Question 15:

No

Please provide your views below:

We do not think that a surrogate's spouse should be a legal parent in any circumstances. If the Law Commission adopts our suggestion that there is no right to object in the pathway and for a parental order to be made pre-birth, the intended parents will be the legal parents from birth in any event (please see our responses to Questions 11-13 and 108). However, even if the surrogate is the legal mother at birth, we do not think her spouse should be the other legal parent:

• The rule which makes a spouse a legal parent in section 35/42 HFEA 2008 is designed to benefit fathers (and second female parents) whose partners conceive through sperm donation; it was never designed for surrogacy cases and is illogical and ill-fitting. We cannot see any case for retaining it. A surrogate's spouse is not a biological parent and has no intention to act as a parent. There is no demand from surrogates' spouses to retain it – in fact the opposite.

• Removing this rule would eliminate the complex and often arbitrary distinctions which currently apply around the surrogate's marital status, including:

o Difficulties managing the complexity of the HFEA forms concerning parenthood, with a need to establish whether the surrogate is married, whether her spouse consents to the conception and if so which forms can be completed to nominate an intended parent other than the biological father as a legal parent;

o The need to establish that the spouse of a surrogate who is separated but still married does not consent to the conception in order to eliminate the need for him to be involved in the parental order application (this has arisen in quite a large number of our cases);

o The risk of a surrogate's spouse refusing consent if there is a separation during the surrogacy process (this happened in a recent US surrogacy case of ours where the surrogate's husband threatened that he would not cooperate with any of the surrogacy paperwork following an acrimonious separation);

o The significant difficulties which arise in the context of British passport applications in establishing to the Passport Office's satisfaction whether an overseas surrogate (often with whom the intended parents have had little contact) is married or unmarried. This question has an often critical effect on whether the child is born British, and the Passport Office are suspicious of documentation provided to demonstrate that a surrogate is not married. In practice, many parents then have to follow an additional British nationality registration application process, which extends the period during which the child is stranded overseas and adds cost and delay.

• Please note that, even if a surrogate's spouse (or partner) is not a legal parent, we do not think that means that he/she should not be involved in or a party to the surrogacy agreement. He/she is an important part of the process and has an important and intrinsic support role for the surrogate. If a man, he may also be committing to abstinence during the period of trying to conceive.

23 Consultation Question 16:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree that intended parents should be registered as the parents of a stillborn child. If the Law Commission adopts our suggestion that there is no right to object in the pathway then the intended parents will be the legal parents of a stillborn child in any event. Where the pathway does not apply, we agree that it should be possible to register the intended parents as the legal parents without a parental order application.

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree that intended parents should be registered as the parents of a child who dies soon after the birth. If the Law Commission adopts our suggestions regarding the surrogate's right to object and for a parental order to be made pre-birth (or promptly post-birth), the intended parents will be the legal parents in any event (please see our responses to Questions 11-13 and 108). If not, we agree that the surrogate should be able to consent to them being so registered without a court process being required (this is humane). However we note the lacuna in respect of a child who dies after the birth is registered but before a parental order is granted.

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

Please provide your views below:

We do not think the surrogate should have a right to object, and therefore the intended parents will be the legal parents if the surrogate dies. Please see our response to Questions 11-13.

However, even if the surrogate retains a right to object, we do not think intended parents should lose their right to be registered as legal parents because the surrogate has died. It seems inhumane in tragic circumstances to require the intended parents to follow a more onerous process than everyone intended, and without any real benefit to anyone. Why is greater judicial oversight needed in these circumstances? Is there any reason to think that a surrogate who died would be less likely to want the intended parents to be recognised as the legal parents from birth? Is it not even more likely she would want the child promptly recognised as the child of the intended parents, given that she cannot now gain any benefit from exercising her right to object?

26 Consultation Question 19:

Other

Please provide your views below:

We think that the intended parents should be the legal parents from birth if the pathway steps have been followed, even if one or both of them has died.

Outside the pathway we think that it should be possible for the court to make a parental order awarding parenthood to the parents who were intended to be the legal parents when the child was conceived, irrespective of what has happened since. The court should therefore be able to make a parental order in favour of both intended parents if one of them has died, and should be able to make a parental order in favour of the intended parents if they have both died (in which case the application would need to be brought by another appropriate person, either the surrogate or the child's nominated guardian):

• The child would then have the same rights as any other children who tragically lose their parents, including rights of inheritance and rights of identity in respect of their birth certificate.

• The guardians nominated by the parents in their wills would then acquire parental responsibility automatically, as for other orphaned children. If no guardians had been nominated, the family court would be able to appoint a guardian under the provisions of the Children Act (which only apply where the child has no surviving parents with parental responsibility). This would protect the surrogate from responsibility as well as protecting the child.

• These issues engage article 8 and article 14 rights for the child and any surviving parent, in respect of his her or identity, biological ties with an intended parent and privacy, with which the law must be compliant. Please note that we are currently in the middle of a case in which the intended father tragically died during the pregnancy, and we are arguing that the court should be able to make a parental order in favour of a deceased parent even though he is not himself an applicant in order to comply with the provisions of the Human Rights Act 1998.

27 Consultation Question 20:

Other

Please provide your views below:

This seems excessively complicated. We think that the relationship status requirement should be removed from the criteria for parental orders, and replaced with a simpler requirement that the court can award parenthood to the person or persons who were intended to be the child's parents at the time of conception.

Please see our response to Question 108 about how we think the parental order process and criteria should be reformed.

28 Consultation Question 21: We invite consultees' views as to: (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

Please provide your views below:

We do not think that a three-parent model is appropriate for surrogacy cases. It does not reflect what any of the parties intends, and it is difficult to see how it is in the best interests of the child. It simply replaces one form of legal limbo with another.

We do think the Law Commission should consider whether a three-parent model should be permitted within UK law for co-parenting situations where a child is intended to have more than two parents.

29 Consultation Question 22:

Please provide your views below:

We have considered this question very carefully, but on balance we think that the pathway is appropriate without further judicial or administrative oversight (other than regulation of surrogacy organisations):

• We considered whether a pre-birth judicial process (giving a pre-birth court order on parentage) would give greater certainty to families than the proposed administrative pathway. We have been mindful of the recent failures of UK fertility clinics to carry out procedural legal parenthood steps in sperm donation cases and the uncertainty and distress this has caused for families later told that they may not be their children's legal parents. We have also been mindful that a court order may be better recognised in other jurisdictions.

• However, we think the process for confirming parenthood should be as simple and light-touch as possible in order to reduce the cost and burden for families. We are also mindful that parents who need a court order have the option of applying for a declaration of parentage under s55A Family Law Act 1986.

• We think that regulated surrogacy organisations will play a key role of oversight, carrying out their responsibilities under licence, and ensuring that other professionals have played their role. Given the significance of this role, we think that only a holder of a surrogacy licence should be able to conduct the necessary welfare of the child assessments and confirm that a surrogacy agreement meets the pathway requirements.

• To protect families and enhance certainty, we think the law should provide specifically that confirmation that a surrogacy arrangement meets the pathway requirements by a regulated surrogacy organisation is conclusive evidence of legal parenthood.

30 Consultation Question 23:

Please provide your views below:

We do not have a strong view on whether it is necessary to adapt the existing welfare checklist:

• Our experience of disputed surrogacy cases is that the court considers a broad range of factual issues under the existing welfare checklist. That includes what was agreed between the parties at the time of conception, the biological and social relationships between the parties and the child, and the willingness of each of the parties to acknowledge and respect the role of the other parties in the child's life. We have no objection to this being explicitly included in the welfare checklist for a child arrangements order, although it is evident from prior case law in any event.

• Going forward, the court may be considering parental order applications in disputed cases as well as child arrangements orders. We think consideration should be given to whether the welfare checklist should be adapted in relation to issues of parentage (as distinct from care arrangements). Please see our comments in response to Question 24.

31 Consultation Question 24:

Please provide your views below:

We think that the current parental order process should be significantly re-designed to update and simplify it (please see our response to Question 108). In line with this, we think the welfare checklist should be adapted for parental order applications:

• If the court is considering a parental order application pre-birth, the welfare assessment should be based on the pre-conception welfare assessment otherwise used in pathway cases because the 'child' does not then exist.

• If the court is considering a parental order application post birth (whether because this is when the application is made or because the pre-birth assessment has raised any concerns), the current welfare checklist for children in parental order applications should be adapted to make it appropriate to surrogacy. For example, it is not appropriate to consider, when determining a transfer of legal parenthood, the likely effect on the child of ceasing to be a member of his or her 'original family' and the child's wishes and feelings usually cannot be meaningfully assessed given that he or she is an infant.

32 Consultation Question 25: We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Please provide your views below:

We think both intended parents and surrogates should be able to apply for a child arrangements order without the court's leave so that they all have the right to ask the court to determine any disputes in relation to contact and/or who the child should live with, and regardless of who the legal parents are.

33 Consultation Question 26:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Yes we agree. However, we also think that the law should be further reformed to enable parenthood to be granted to intended parents more quickly, even outside the pathway (see our response to Question 108).

34 Consultation Question 27:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree if this model is adopted, although we do not think there should be a condition that the child is living with them – they should have parental responsibility on the basis of their intent to apply for a parental order.

However, as expressed elsewhere, we do not generally agree with this model. We think the intended parents should be the legal parents from birth without the surrogate having a right to object, and should have parental responsibility automatically. Even if the Law Commission disagrees with this, we think that (if the surrogate exercises her right to object) the intended parents should be the legal parents (with parental responsibility) while a parental order application is considered and that their parental responsibility should only be terminated if the court so decides. Please see our responses to Questions 11-13.

35 Consultation Question 28: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

If the objection model is adopted, we do not agree that a surrogate should have parental responsibility during the objection period, unless she exercises her right to object. The overwhelming majority of surrogates will not wish to exercise their right to object and so parental responsibility is an unwanted burden which goes against their wishes. Sharing parental responsibility with the intended parents for 35 days post-birth is merely likely to promote confusion among health professionals in the key post-natal period.

However, as expressed elsewhere, we do not generally agree with this model. If the surrogate does not have a right to object, she will not be a legal parent at birth and will not have parental responsibility. If alternatively her right to object only triggers a court process, then again she will not have parental responsibility unless awarded by the court. Please see our responses to Questions 11-13.

36 Consultation Question 29:

Please provide your views below:

We think this is overly complicated and that there should be no automatic restrictions on parental responsibility:

• In line with our other responses, we do not think that, within the new pathway, there should be any shared parental responsibility since the intended parents will be the sole legal parents from birth.

• In cases falling outside the pathway, the legal parents will (pending the grant of a parental order, assuming one is not made pre-birth) be the surrogate and one of the intended parents, and they will presumably share parental responsibility. In practice, we have not seen any cases where someone has sought to interfere in parental responsibility decisions and we see no practical need to put complicated legal structures around parental responsibility in the interim period. These are likely to be poorly understood in the general population, and will only be relevant for a limited period.

• We think that the family court's existing powers to manage any issues concerning interim parental responsibility under the child arrangements order framework are sufficient, if required.

• We propose that the parental order system be reformed more extensively to enable orders to be made pre-birth or very promptly post-birth so that the limbo period is minimised. Please see our response to Question 108.

Chapter 9: The Regulation of Surrogacy Arrangements

37 Consultation Question 30: We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway:

• Although Brilliant Beginnings has made a policy decision to focus on gestational surrogacy, we think that traditional surrogacy is equally legitimate. We have in fact evolved our policy to include traditional surrogates who are friends or family members or are part of a team who has experienced failed transfers as gestational surrogacy journeys. We have also reviewed our intake policy to include traditional surrogates who are prepared to work through a clinic for IVF. We recognise that it is a simpler, less invasive and less costly form of surrogacy for many surrogates and intended parents and therefore see no reason not to include traditional surrogacy within the new pathway.

• We think it is important for policy to be based on evidence, and we have seen research from Cambridge University which has demonstrated good outcomes for traditional surrogacy. We also see no evidence from our legal experience that traditional surrogacy is more likely to result in a dispute, despite popular misconception about the greater risk of a change of heart if there is a biological connection. We fundamentally think that the law should respect the choices of women to commit to being an egg donor and a surrogate for the same intended parent/s.

• However, we do think that traditional surrogacy poses different challenges to gestational surrogacy and that these need to be managed. Counselling should explore with everyone the significance of the genetic connection, the impact on the surrogate's own children and wider family etc. The medical screening will also need to be different, given that the scope for quarantining sperm etc is not possible where conception takes place at home. This can be dealt with in a specific surrogacy Code of Practice from the regulator.

• Our long legal experience shows that traditional surrogacy arrangements are particularly vulnerable to risk of problems, not because of the genetic issues, but because the opportunity to conceive through home insemination means that it is easier for the parties to a surrogacy arrangement to rush ahead without any third party involvement which encourages them to pause, think things through and set clear foundations. We think that the pathway requirements will provide a significant protection in this regard, and that traditional surrogacies should have the opportunity to fall within them.

38 Consultation Question 31: We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

Please provide your views below:

No response – we are not an independent surrogate or parent through independent surrogacy.

39 Consultation Question 32:

Please provide your views below:

We think that there should be a dividing line between surrogacy cases in which there has been oversight by a regulated surrogacy organisation, and those in which there has not. However, we would like to bring independent surrogacy groups (and particularly those which do encourage appropriate screening and safeguards) within this structure as far as possible:

• For the pathway to operate with integrity, there needs to be someone accountable to verify that steps have been followed and 'sign off' a surrogacy agreement for legal parenthood purposes. In practice, we think this can only be done by a regulated surrogacy organisation subject to an HFEA surrogacy licence which requires compliance with a surrogacy Code of Practice. The regulated surrogacy organisation will fulfil certain responsibilities itself as well as pulling together the threads of input from other professionals (medical, legal, counselling).

• Provided that an individual is willing to become the 'person responsible' on behalf of an independent surrogacy group and to obtain and fulfil the licence requirements, we see no reason why independent surrogacy groups should not be brought within this framework, even if their collective organisation is looser than the more formal non-profit surrogacy organisations.

• We do not think that the HFEA directly, lawyers or fertility clinics without surrogacy licences should be able to validate surrogacy arrangements under the pathway. In respect of the HFEA, this would be a significant departure from their current oversight and licensing role and we do not think they have the skills, or will want, to fulfil this role. In respect of clinics and lawyers, they only have experience in one limited area of the pathway and will not be subject to the surrogacy Code of Practice which will ensure that the more nuanced checks (such as the welfare of the child assessment) are properly done.

• We think that surrogacy organisations should be encouraged to offer light-touch service options for surrogacy teams who do not require matching (including teams who have met independently, and friends and family surrogacies), so that they can be taken through the key parts of the pathway appropriately. At Brilliant Beginnings we already offer this, with a service for friends and family which includes a mediation process to help consider all the issues and put things in writing, and legal advice. This both helps give structure as well as expose areas of misalignment and potential conflict.

• We think those who choose to operate truly independently (without involving a surrogacy organisation at all) should not be able to self-certify that they have followed the pathway steps. We do not see how this would be practical given the need to conduct a welfare of the child assessment and medical screening. We also think these arrangements are the most risky and the most prone to problems, and it is appropriate for them to be excluded from the benefits of the regulated process and to fall within the safety net of judicial oversight instead.

40 Consultation Question 33:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree with the proposal that there should be regulated surrogacy organisations:

• Brilliant Beginnings, COTS and Surrogacy UK (and some of the well run independent surrogacy groups) have, we think, self-regulated very well to date, and have a wealth of practical experience of surrogacy. Any regulation should therefore make sure to include them as far as possible.

• We have experience of another UK surrogacy agency mentioned in the Law Commission's consultation document which appeared to be operating commercially and did not engage in ethical or honest practice, and provided extremely poor support to both intended parents and surrogates. We had numerous clients complain of very difficult experiences, and were approached for information by both the Department of Health and (on several different occasions) the police following complaints to them. Without a regulator to report the agency to, there was very little that could be done. We understand that they still operate matching UK surrogates in the UK with UK IPs although have moved their head office to the US, which might be to circumvent the UK legal restrictions. We think regulation will help safeguard against these kinds of experiences from being repeated and new organisations being established without any regard for complexities and stresses of surrogacy.

41 Consultation Question 34:

representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;, managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;, ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;, training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and, providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Please provide your views below:

We agree with the proposed responsibilities for licence-holders.

In line with our proposal that the law should state that a certification of a surrogacy agreement from a regulated surrogacy organisation is determinative in respect of parenthood (see our response to Questions 8 and 22), we wonder if it would be helpful for a licence holder to have specific responsibility, when validating that a surrogacy agreement has met the pathway requirements, to do so honestly and with all due diligence.

We do not think it is necessary to stipulate any particular experience, skills or qualifications to be a licence holder, but we do think there should be some kind of character requirement. This might be modelled on the character requirements for solicitors and, for example, exclude people who have been disqualified as directors or convicted of any offence involving dishonesty

42 Consultation Question 35: We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

While we agree that the law should retain the prevention of profit-making surrogacy introduction services, we have really struggled this question because we think it conflates this with another quite separate issue, which is the purpose and scope of HFEA regulation.

Ultimately we think that the non-profit restriction should relate to the activity of surrogacy introduction, rather than the licensed organisation as whole. We think that HFEA licensing should confirm to who is properly qualified and regulated to confirm compliance with the pathway, irrespective of whether or not they are a non-profit making body:

• It would be illogical to allow profit-making licensed fertility clinics to have a licence which enables them to manage the pathway, while requiring surrogacy organisations to be non-profit to do precisely the same thing.

• If HFEA licences can only be granted to non-profit making bodies, this takes the non-profit restriction significantly further than the current law. Potentially it would cover all the activities conducted by a surrogacy organisation, rather than just its introduction services.

• We are concerned that this may have unforeseen implications and might inadvertently prevent (desirable) professional involvement in aspects of surrogacy which are not related to the initial introduction (such as legal advice, medical screening, counselling, mediation and therapy, which are all routinely provided on a profit-making basis). We have seen through our experience in Canada that restrictions on intermediaries' activities have had a detrimental effect in terms of safeguarding, since screening and preparation is not properly carried out. We would be happy to have a further discussion about this.

In respect of our response to retain the non-profit requirement for the specific activity of introduction services, we have considered this question carefully and consulted parents and surrogates we have worked with. Some felt that it was illogical to require 'agency' services to be required to be non profit while fertility clinics and lawyers are not, and/or wanted to encourage more professional UK agencies to stimulate choice and better availability of surrogates. However, conversely others felt that the UK's current surrogacy services have real 'heart' which might be put in jeopardy if a profit incentive were introduced, and that allowing profit-making agencies could add to the costs for intended parents. On balance we take a pragmatic view that the current system of non-profit introduction services is working well, and that there is no real need or demand to change it, at least for the time being.

43 Consultation Question 36: We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

Please provide your views below:

On the basis that this definition relates to potential criminal restrictions, we would suggest that it is very clearly drawn in relation to what we would call 'introduction services' possibly defined as follows: 'Arranging or facilitating the introduction of potential surrogates and intended parents with a view to them making a surrogacy arrangement'.

• We think that referring to 'introduction services' rather than 'matching' has the advantage of capturing both active matching services (such as those provided by Brilliant Beginnings) and the activities of the other surrogacy organisations which do not 'match' but do provide physical or online spaces to enable surrogates and intended parents to connect with each other.

• 'Introduction services' is a similar but more modern equivalent to the activities permitted only for non-profit organisations in the Surrogacy Arrangements Act 1985 (compiling lists of prospective parents/surrogates and introducing them to each other). These restrictions have, in practice, created the existing system of non-profit surrogacy organisations.

• We do not think the law should go further by providing that 'facilitation' should attract criminal restrictions if offered for profit. We have considered the activities suggested in the consultation document which might fall within facilitation (rather than matching), which are:

o providing advice and support to surrogates and intended parents on the surrogacy process, and o helping to manage the relationship.

These are activities which may (desirably) also be offered by professionals who make a profit. For example, private fertility clinics provide advice and support on the surrogacy process; lawyers give legal advice on the surrogacy process and help to manage the relationship by drafting the agreement; other professionals give support including counsellors, therapists, mediators etc. We do not think the intention is to prevent professional support being offered or to restrict this kind of wider support to non-profit organisations.

44 Consultation Question 37: We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

Again, we think this question conflates what are separate issues. We think that:

• Only non-profit organisations should be able to offer introduction services for payment.

• Only regulated licence-holders should be able to verify that an arrangement complies with the pathway.

In practice, parents and surrogates match/meet via informal Facebook groups, social events, friends and family and in lots of different ways, and we do not think it is possible or practical for the law to require everyone facilitating introductions to have a licence (although it can prevent them operating for profit if they receive any payment).

We think it is possible, and desirable, to enable people who have met other than via a regulated surrogacy organisation to ask a regulated surrogacy organisation to verify that they have followed all the proper steps if they wish to qualify for the pathway. If they do not do so, they can instead apply for a parental order.

45 Consultation Question 37: We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

Please see answer to 1.44.

46 Consultation Question 38: We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

Please provide your views below:

See response to Questions 35-37. We think that criminal offences should be apply to individuals and organisations which provide 'introduction services' for profit. However, we do not think there should be any penalties for those offering introduction services (without profit) without a licence, because this does not seem workable. We do think there should be some kind of criminal penalty for a person or organisation holding themselves out as a licenced surrogacy organisation when they are not.

47 Consultation Question 39: We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree with this proposal, but think that regulation by the HFEA must be appropriate, proportionate and specific to surrogacy:

• There is no existing suitable regulator for surrogacy other than the HFEA, and the numbers of surrogacy arrangements do not currently justify the creation of a specialist regulator. The HFEA is also well-suited to operate the national surrogacy register alongside the Register of Information for donor-conceived people.

• However, we are mindful that the HFEA's existing experience of surrogacy is extremely limited, and almost entirely related to the clinical aspects of surrogacy which are a tiny part of the overall process of screening, matching, reaching an agreement, pregnancy, birth and legal process. The bulk of successful surrogacy management is about legal, emotional, psychological and communication issues throughout a long process, and the clinical aspects are a relatively small part of it (and for traditional surrogacy arrangements often not even present where there is no medical intervention).

• We therefore think that regulation for surrogacy may need to look very different to existing HFEA regulation. We would suggest that there is a separate surrogacy licence, with a separate Code of Practice administered by a specialist section of the HFEA. Given the HFEA's limited existing experience we would recommend that the HFEA works with the existing UK surrogacy organisations to design appropriate regulation and Code of Practice.

48 Consultation Question 40: We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms). Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

This is not a straightforward question to answer yes or no to, since a surrogacy agreement contains various different aspects. To break the question down, our thoughts are as follows:

• Whether an agreement should be enforceable in relation to the handover of the child at birth – We do not think that a surrogate should, as a question of contract law, be compelled to hand over a child (we think this is generally what people mean when they talk about agreements being 'unenforceable'). If there is any dispute about who the child should live with, the family court determines child arrangements on a best interests basis. This is a separate question to legal parenthood, is already the case, and is not subject to any change as a result of this consultation.

• Whether an agreement should be enforceable in relation to legal parenthood – We do not think that an agreement, of itself, should be enforceable as a matter of contract law in the civil court. However, we do think that if the parties have satisfied all the pathway requirements (which include putting a written agreement in place, but other steps too) then the intended parents should be the legal parents. For clarity, even if in the pathway the surrogate does not have a right to object (see our response to Questions 11-13), we do not think that means that the agreement is 'enforceable' since legal parenthood is created by operation of law and the written agreement is only one part of the requirements.

• Whether an agreement should be enforceable in relation to the financial terms – Yes we think it should, in the civil court, as a matter of contract law. This will enable a surrogate to claim any unpaid expenses/compensation from her intended parents and for the intended parents to not be liable for expenses/compensation over and above what is agreed.

• Whether an agreement should be enforceable in relation to medical consent decisions during the treatment and pregnancy – No, we think a surrogate should retain the right to make all medical decisions which affect her person (including whether to have a termination). Although such issues should be recorded in an agreement (to reflect discussion about this to achieve alignment between the parties as far as possible), these terms should be statements of intention and not contractually enforceable. We doubt, in any event, that it would be legally possible to enforce terms like this in civil law.

• Whether an agreement should be enforceable in relation to lifestyle issues – Surrogacy agreements commonly record issues agreed between the parties concerning lifestyle issues, such as the surrogate and her partner abstaining from sex during the period of trying to conceive, healthy lifestyle conditions (such as an agreement not to take recreational drugs, and to follow medical advice), travel restrictions (to prevent a child being born in a jurisdiction which does not support surrogacy) etc. We do not think these kinds of terms should be enforceable through specific performance (i.e. a surrogate should not be compelled to comply) although we doubt that it would be legally possible to do this in any event. However, we do think there may be a case for financial sanctions in some circumstances, for example where a surrogate knowingly ignores an agreement not to travel outside the country in the late stages of the pregnancy, and this results in the child being born overseas and very significant medical and legal costs for the intended parents as a result. It is possible this could be limited e.g. to a partial return of any compensation or fee paid other than expenses.

49 Consultation Question 41: We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree that there should be no such prohibition:

• To be clear, the current law does not prohibit 'advising on' or 'facilitating' surrogacy agreements. The Surrogacy Arrangements Act 1985 only prohibits charging for 'negotiating' a surrogacy agreement.

• In practice, mediators, counsellors and support workers all routinely act as neutral intermediaries in UK surrogacy. They facilitate the discussion between intended parents and surrogates to help them reach their own agreement, and this is invaluable in ensuring the issues are properly discussed.

• However, under the current law the parties cannot access legal help in respect of negotiating and drafting the specific terms of a surrogacy agreement. UK surrogacy agreements are usually based on a template with a tick box format, rather than being specifically drafted. We have experience of many cases in which resulted ambiguity has caused difficulties between the parties at a later stage, particularly in respect of financial terms (for example, what a surrogate should be paid in the event of a miscarriage or in recognition of delivering twins).

• Allowing legal input into an agreement is an important safeguard, both to allow clarity and precision in the drafting, and to support the fairness of terms of both parties are legally represented. Proper drafting is important given that a surrogacy agreement will, under the proposed new law, have much greater significance than it does currently, both as an element of the pathway to legal parenthood, and in respect of the financial terms being enforceable.

• We even considered whether to propose that independent legal representation in preparing the agreement (and not just independent legal advice) should be a requirement of the pathway. In other jurisdictions (including California and Illinois) this is seen as a critical safeguard. However, we recognise the need to balance safeguards with costs, and think the costs of requiring legal input in the agreement likely to be more significant than the cost of legal advice. We therefore do not think that legal input into the agreement should be required, but do think it should be permitted and encouraged as best practice.

50 Consultation Question 42: We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Yes we agree that the ban on advertising should be removed:

• The law is widely breached in practice, particularly on online matching sites and Facebook groups (with various urban myths, such as that describing yourself as 'unmatched' is a way around the prohibition).

• The restrictions put surrogacy organisations at a disadvantage online, because they are more cautious about breaching the rules on advertising than individuals.

• We are not aware of a single case where there has been a prosecution under the existing law, which is in any event badly drafted and not fit for the digital age.

• The policy behind the ban on advertising was the desire to prevent surrogacy from occurring, which is inconsistent with modern attitudes on surrogacy. We do not see that the current ban serves any real purpose.

Chapter 10: Children's Access to Information About Surrogacy Arrangements

51 Consultation Question 43: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree. We were not aware that this was not possible until discussions with the Law Commission informed us that the intended regulations to allow surrogate-born people to access their birth records were never enacted.

52 Consultation Question 44: We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

We do not agree that the birth certificates of people born through surrogacy should state that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement:

• There have been extensive Parliamentary and policy discussions about whether donor-conceived people should have an annotation on their birth certificate to indicate the circumstances of their conception. Parliament settled against such an annotation, primarily because a birth certificate is a public document used for various purposes where it would not be appropriate for a person to have to disclose the circumstances of their conception. We think the same concerns apply to surrogate-born people, and there are Convention rights involved here (in particular the article 8 right to private life).

• We would welcome a wider debate about the information to be recorded on birth certificates, and in particular whether we should consider including an annotation on all UK birth certificates which says that a birth certificate is a record of legal parentage and that other information may be available through the HFEA registers (but without publicly singling out people conceived through assisted reproduction).

• While we support the right of surrogate-born people to know the circumstances of their conception and think that openness and honesty should always be encouraged, we also think that surrogate-born people should be treated consistently with other people conceived through assisted reproduction, and given the same rights to privacy.

53 Consultation Question 45: We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

Please provide your views below:

Yes we think the birth registration system needs further review. In particular, our work with modern families means that we see the lack of recognition for trans parents (highlighted in the recent case of Re TT) and multiple parent families (where only two of three or four parents can be registered on the birth certificate).

54 Consultation Question 46: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree that good quality information should be kept for surrogate-born people and made accessible to them at an appropriate age. To ease access to information (and to ensure that information is accessible to existing children as well as those conceived going forward), we wondered whether it might be possible for existing court files to be transferred to any new national surrogacy register.

55 Consultation Question 47:

Other

Please provide your views below:

We agree with this proposal, but with some safeguards:

• We assume the register will be run in a similar way to the HFEA Register of Information for donor-conceived people.

• We are conscious that not all information will be available in all surrogacy cases (for example in international surrogacy cases where an anonymous donor has been used), but we think reasonable efforts should be made to collect and safeguard whatever information is available.

• We had feedback from several parents through surrogacy that, while they supported their children having access to information about themselves, they felt nervous about being included in a state register which might be used for other purposes without their consent. We would suggest that the law makes clear the purposes for which information on the register can be used, and that this is narrowly defined.

56 Consultation Question 48: We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

Please provide your views below:

Yes we agree.

57 Consultation Question 49:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Yes we agree with this proposal:

• We are mindful that many surrogate-born people will be on both the surrogacy and donor-conceived registers (if an egg donor was used in the UK as well as a surrogate). Information should therefore be accessible, and provided, in a joined-up and sensible way.

• We therefore think the rules for accessing information at 16, 18 and before should be consistent with those for the register for donor-conceived people.

• We are mindful that the growing dominance of DNA testing sites which are enabling people to find donors more informally outside the scope of the register. This may make a case for giving more structured access to the register before children reach the age of 16, but any changes should be consistent to both groups.

• As a matter of language we would encourage the Law Commission to avoid using the word 'children' when referring to a person over the age of 18.

58 Consultation Question 50: We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

Please provide your views below:

Although including this would be consistent with the rights of donor-conceived people, we think it will be of limited practical significance:

• It would be interesting to know how many requests of this kind have been made by donor-conceived people since 1991, to see whether this right is one which is ever exercised, or just something which reassured Parliamentarians about the risk of donor-conceived genetic siblings inadvertently having children with each other.

• We question whether it will matter to surrogate-born people to be related to someone gestationally.

• Our experience is that surrogate-born people are very likely to know their surrogates, while very few donor-conceived people (or their parents) know their donors.

• Surrogate-born people will be able to access identifying information from the age of 18 anyway, so this will only really matter to those entering into relationships between the age of 16 and 18.

59 Consultation Question 51:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Yes we agree to both these proposals. They raise an interesting question about whether the information on the register should be limited to genetic connections or should also include wider information about who collaborated to help conceive a child. We take the view that it is not for anyone else to decide what types of information may be important to surrogate-born people, and that all such information should be accessible.

60 Consultation Question 52:

Please provide your views below:

We support, in principle, information being available so that individuals can decide for themselves what they wish to access. We know there is an existing gap in the law for donor-conceived people, who are not able to contact genetic siblings who are the donor's own children via the register (which we have been told is because those children are not recorded on the HFEA register). We would therefore welcome that, if surrogate-born children and surrogates' children are given such a right, the rules in relation to donation should be tidied up to match.

61 Consultation Question 53: For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Please provide your views below:

We are not entirely clear what this question means. Is the Law Commission envisaging an intended parent who subsequently abdicates responsibility for his/her child and does not apply for a parental order? If so we think there is a case for such a person being required to be a legal parent (either by pathway or parental order) in which case there would be no need to record them on the register. Otherwise they should be so recorded.

Chapter 11: Eligibility Criteria for a Parental Order

62 Consultation Question 54: We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished. Do consultees agree?

Please provide your views below:

We agree, since case law now means that this deadline no longer in reality exists, and statutory amendment would make this clearer. We were involved in a case in which even the court did not know this, and refused to issue an application made out of time since it was not aware of the ruling in Re X (2014).

However, we propose more extensive modification to the criteria and process of parental orders. See our response to Question 108.

63 Consultation Question 55:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree that the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate to a parental order if in the child's best interests:

• Under the current law a surrogate (or her spouse) can permanently veto the intended parents' legal parenthood for any reason at all (including irrational reasons contrary to the child's best interests), and the court has no power to override this. This is contrary to the principle which runs through the whole of UK family law that the child's welfare is the court's paramount consideration. It is also conceptually bizarre, given that a surrogate who has carried someone else's child has more power in law to retain legal parenthood than a woman who has given birth to her own child who can have her consent waived in the context of an adoption application.

• We assume that, if there is no time limit for making a parental order application, it would be possible for any parents previously blocked from apply for a parental order to do so following a change in the law (subject to meeting the other requirements) and we would encourage this.

We think the requirement that the child is living with the parents to be an unnecessary restriction:

• As we have said elsewhere, we think the issues of arrangements for the child and legal parenthood should be kept separate. In practice a family court is unlikely to award parenthood where the child is not living with the intended parents but this can form part of its general assessment of what is in the child's best interests, without any need to make it a legislative requirement.

• Such a requirement may create a greater incentive for a surrogate who has fallen out with her intended parents and objects to a parental order not to surrender the child to the parents.

Chapter 12: Eligibility Criteria for Both a Parental Order and for the New Pathway

64 Consultation Question 56:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree with the proposal that eligibility for the pathway and a parental order should be expanded to include intended parents who are habitually resident in the UK as well as those who are domiciled here:

• We have given jurisdiction careful consideration, given the understandable policy intention not to make the UK a surrogacy 'destination'. We think this is a real prospect, given that both Brilliant Beginnings and NGA receive enquiries from intended parents from outside the UK who wish to access UK surrogacy (particularly from European countries which prohibit surrogacy). A short qualifying residence period might help with this.

• We have been involved in a small handful of cases (probably not more than 10) in which parents from overseas who are neither resident nor domiciled in the UK have proceeded with UK surrogacy arrangements. Most of these have involved UK surrogates who are existing friends or relatives of the intended parents (for example the sister of an Australian intended mother) and who consent to remaining the legal mother in the UK. However, in two cases, male same-sex couples from Ireland had connected with UK surrogates on Facebook and had children born in the UK who were never subject to a parental order, with the surrogates seemingly unaware of the implications of this for them. In most cases, the domicile requirement for a parental order deters this.

• However, enabling parents to establish jurisdiction on the basis of residence as well as domicile is likely to reduce legal burden and delay. We have worked with many parents (probably more than a hundred) who are originally from outside the UK and who under the current rules need to demonstrate that their move is permanent and that they never intend to leave (including Re A and B (2013)). The bar for establishing domicile of choice is high, and subjective, and the High Court judges take individualised approaches. One in particular applies an unreasonable level of scepticism even when proper evidence has been filed, and this creates a significant burden for applicant parents, legal complication and delay.

• It is very difficult for agencies to assess clearly whether intended parents are UK domiciled or not. Brilliant Beginnings has a high level of prospective or actual intended parent clients who need to be referred for early legal advice with the NGA Law team.

• The children of parents living long term in the UK (but where their parents have an eventual intention to return to their country of origin) are left completely outside the current rules, which means they have no sensible means of securing their legal parentage while they are living as a family – often long term – in the UK.

• It is also important, however, that domicile also remains as a base of jurisdiction. We have worked with a significant number of intended parents (more than a hundred, at least) who are British parents living overseas who plan to return to the UK in the future and wish to secure their parental status at home (including CC v DD (2014) and Re AB (2016)).

Please see above answer to question 56 (1.68).

65 Consultation Question 57:

Please provide your views below:

We think that the relationship status requirements should be abolished, and that the law – in recognising shared intention as the foundation of a surrogacy arrangement - should more straightforwardly focus on who intended to be a legal parent:

• The original policy underpinning the relationship status requirement was to restrict parental orders (and so indirectly to restrict access to surrogacy) to heterosexual married couples only. Eligibility expanded from 2010 to include same-sex and unmarried couples, but a policy line remained which excluded single parents. However, following the ruling of the President in our case of Re Z (2016) that this was incompatible with articles 8 and 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights and discriminatory, section 54A was passed to end that discrimination and include single applicants. The initial version of the remedial order had to be redrafted following feedback from the Joint Committee on Human Rights that the narrowly drawn definition of single applicants would have excluded some parents from being able to apply on the basis of relationship status, and that was not acceptable. Current policy is therefore that the law should not discriminate on the basis of relationship status.

• At the same time, the various different categories in the legislation mean that applicants need to fit within one box or another, and that can be complicated. Case law has had to 'read down' the legislation to get around the rules and ensure they are compatible with the Convention, for example where joint applicants have separated, are not cohabiting or one has died.

• What we now have is therefore just a complex set of categories which excludes almost no one and reflects no coherent policy.

• In line with surrogacy being about shared intention, we think that a parental order should confer parenthood on the people who intended to be the child's parents at the time of conception, regardless of their relationship status.

• We also think that the potential applicants for a parental order should not only be the people who wish to acquire legal parenthood. We think it should be possible for the application to be brought by any of the intended parents (if one is unwilling or has died), the surrogate (to enforce responsibility on the intended parents if they seek to abandon the child, in line with the pathway) or (if both intended parents have died) any guardian appointed for the child, on the basis that the order sought would make whoever intended to be the parents at the time of conception the child's legal parents.

This would mean that an intended parent could not abdicate his or her responsibilities by failing to apply (someone else could apply on their behalf – either their partner or the surrogate). It would enable bereaved children to have their parentage recognised. If a requirement for a genetic link is retained, it would also resolve the difficulties we have seen in practice when parents separate or one dies and the surviving sole applicant is not a biological parent.

66 Consultation Question 58: We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide views below:

We do not agree. While this will not be factually problematic in most cases, we think that the pathway is a mechanism which deals with legal parenthood rather than child arrangements, and that it is conceptually better to keep the two separate. We therefore think that, if a declaration is made, it should be that the intended parents intend to be the child's legal parents.

67 Consultation Question 59:

Other

Please provide views below:

We agree that double donation should be permitted in the new pathway, but we do not agree that there should be a 'medical necessity' requirement:

• Double donation is permissible in UK fertility treatment where no surrogate is involved. It therefore seems illogical not to allow it in surrogacy. There is no real rationale for a genetic connection being crucial if someone needs the help of a surrogate but not otherwise.

• The current requirement for a genetic link has a disproportionate impact on single women, because it is relatively common for whatever fertility/medical issues have affected a woman's ability to carry a pregnancy to also have affected her ability to provide her own eggs. The majority of the single women we work with fall into this category. Although not yet legally challenged, it is possible this is indirect discrimination and/or a breach of Convention rights.

• UK law has never had a requirement of medical necessity for surrogacy, and we struggle to see why there is any practical need to introduce one. Of the 1,000+ surrogacy cases we have dealt with, we have never seen a case of 'social surrogacy' where there was no good reason to use a surrogate. We have had a small handful of cases in which women have suffered from tokophobia, a poorly-understood psychological condition which leads to a fear of pregnancy and/or birth. If a medical necessity requirement was introduced, we would be concerned that such women would be discriminated against and/or would feel even more marginalised than they already do. We would also be concerned about potential discrimination against trans parents and others who may have good but non-medical/non-necessary reasons for using donors.

We are neutral as to whether the requirement for a genetic connection should remain for surrogacy cases in which parental orders are needed (both domestic and international):

• On the one hand we have worked with a small number (maybe 7 to 10) parents who have conceived without a biological connection, 2 couples and the rest single women, all through well-regulated US surrogacy arrangements. None have chosen to apply for adoption in the UK, which means that their children all remain in legal limbo, without a secure legal connection with their parents. If a parental order was available they would likely have applied to resolve things properly, as most parents through surrogacy do. It is important to remember that parental orders resolve parenthood; they do not act as a gateway to determine who can access surrogacy. Restricting parental orders therefore may simply mean that some children are denied legal parentage.

• We hope that it will be possible for UK law to recognise legal parenthood in some overseas surrogacy cases automatically (either through the proposed Secretary of State's power, or by the proposal we have made in response to Question 98). If so, we presume that this will include those using double-donation, which we would welcome to reduce the impact of the prohibition on parents doing this, and to incentivise 'good' destinations.

• However, we also acknowledge the counter-argument that surrogacy might be used as a disguise for child trafficking and that the requirement for a genetic connection is a secure way of ensuring that the intended parents were involved pre conception. This may be an issue, not just internationally, but also in respect of UK surrogates. We have had a number of enquiries over the years from pregnant women wanting to arrange a surrogacy when they should be arranging an adoption through the proper authorities. We do not feel we know enough about child trafficking to be able to comment further on this.

68 Consultation Question 60: We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Yes we agree, although see our response to Questions 11-13 regarding the surrogate's right to object. If she does not have a right to object, we cannot easily see how an arrangement could begin in the new pathway but then fall outside it.

69 Consultation Question 61: We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order. 71 Consultation Question 63:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree that all available information should be retained for the child as far as possible:

• It should be straightforward to record the surrogate's details on the national surrogacy register, whether through the surrogacy agreement in the pathway or through the parental order application outside it.

• Recording gamete donors is likely to be more complicated. If conception takes place via traditional surrogacy, this can be taken from the surrogacy agreement or parental order application. If a third party donor is used and conception takes place at a UK licensed clinic, this information will be sent to the HFEA Register of Information in any event. The difficulty arises if a donor has been used overseas. Some jurisdictions (such as the US) have a choice over anonymous and known donors; while in most other surrogacy destinations the donors are anonymous. We would suggest that the best available information is collected in all cases, but that it should not be required to give the donor's details.

72 Consultation Question 64:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order, although this should be taken into account as part of the welfare of the child assessment:

• We have worked with a number of significantly older parents who have conceived children (mainly in the US) and then sought our help to obtain a parental order/British nationality. There may be genuine welfare issues in such cases, which the court looks at closely when an application is made. However, denying such parents access to a parental order is unlikely to deter them from conceiving; it will merely deny their children secure legal parenthood.

Within the pathway it may be possible to enforce an upper age limit through regulation:

• This is possible within the pathway since oversight before conception means that the law can exclude certain categories of potential parents.

• At Brilliant Beginnings we follow the policy of UK fertility clinics, which is usually 50 - 54, and guidelines issued by ASRM in the US which is 55 (or a combined age for a couple of 110 years).

We agree that the parties should be over 18 before entering into a surrogacy agreement.

Chapter 13: Eligibility Criteria for the New Pathway

74 Consultation Question 66:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree that there should be medical screening for a surrogate, her partner (if involved) and the intended parents providing gametes:

• We do not think this proposal is controversial, since it broadly reflects what UK surrogacy organisations (and fertility clinics, where they are involved) already do. Enshrining this in regulation will ensure that there is consistency between the different organisations, and that all parties (and the child) are kept safe.
We have the following thoughts as to how this could work in practice:

• The regulated surrogacy organisation, before ratifying the validity of a surrogacy agreement, should be satisfied that medical screening has been carried out satisfactorily by an appropriately qualified medical professional.

• The object of medical screening should be to confirm that the use of the intended parents' gametes will not place the surrogate, her partner or the child at unreasonable risk; and that the surrogate is likely to be able to conceive and carry a pregnancy without unreasonable risk to herself or the child. We do not think the detail of how this objective is achieved needs to be set out in the law; it should be left to the licensing/ regulation system which can evolve.

• We think the current HFEA Code of Practice for licensed clinics can be used as a starting point for the regulatory obligations of licensed surrogacy organisations, but that it will need adapting to be

o more appropriate to surrogacy (for example in not classifying intended parents who are HIV+ with no detectable viral load as gamete donors) and o to include traditional surrogacies where no clinic is involved (where different procedures may be practically needed e.g. different testing for transmissible diseases given that there will not opportunity to quarantine sperm).

• For completeness, we note that the Law Commission does not think that psychological screening is necessary as a pre-conception step. Although we do not feel that this should be a legal requirement (for reasons of cost), this is something we have recently introduced at Brilliant Beginnings, and we do think it has huge value in assessing surrogates' suitability for the emotional and personal experience of surrogacy, and is a valuable example of best practice.

75 Consultation Question 67:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree that there should be implications counselling for a surrogate, her partner (if involved) and the intended parents:

• We do not think this proposal is controversial, since it broadly reflects what UK surrogacy organisations already recommend and what fertility clinics already provide where the surrogacy is gestational. Enshrining this in regulation will ensure that there is consistency between the different organisations, and that all parties (and the child) are kept safe.

• The only significant issue is whether the law should require counselling to be offered (as is currently the position under the HFEA Code of Practice) or whether it should be mandatory. We think, given the sensitivity and significance of a surrogacy arrangement, counselling should be mandatory for those wishing to qualify for the 'pathway'. We accept that this may add some cost for those going through traditional surrogacy arrangements who do not currently opt to access professional counselling. However, given our experience of disputed surrogacy cases in which parents and surrogates were not adequately prepared emotionally for the surrogacy, we think this is justified.

We have the following thoughts as to how this should work in practice:

• The regulated surrogacy organisation, before ratifying the validity of a surrogacy agreement, should be satisfied that all parties have had implications counselling with an appropriately qualified counsellor.

• The object of implications counselling should be to provide a confidential space in which the parties can honestly explore their feelings about the proposed surrogacy, and have the opportunity to think about important issues they may not have considered. Counselling is therefore about preparation and not about suitability screening. However, it goes to heart of ensuring both informed consent and the welfare of the child. We do not think the detail of how this objective is achieved needs to be set out in the law; it should be left to the licensing/ regulation system which can evolve, and which can sensitively deal with the differing emotional implications of gestational and traditional surrogacy.

• We think it may be sensible for BICA to review its current guidance about the issues which should be covered in implications counselling. The list set out in the consultation document at paragraph 13.30 covers various issues which constitute legal and medical advice, which we think fall outside the expertise of a counsellor. We have experienced cases in the past in which incorrect legal advice has been given to intended parents and surrogates by well-meaning counsellors (including about legal parenthood, about what happens if a surrogate 'changes her mind' etc).

76 Consultation Question 68: We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree that independent legal advice should be required for a surrogate and her partner (if involved) and for the intended parents. We have seen some commentary from other UK surrogacy organisations suggesting that legal advice should not be mandatory, we think mainly due to concern about cost. We think legal advice is important as a mandatory 'pathway' requirement and that the additional cost is justified by the benefits, for the following reasons:

• The cost of providing basic legal advice (see our response to Question 112 which suggests a fee of £300 plus VAT) is not excessive, and will be offset from the saving of the parental order court fee (£215) and also from saving the costs of wills for both the intended parents and the surrogate (which are currently needed because the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth). While additional legal services (such as drafting of the agreement) will be available we would recommend them as best practice, we do not think these need to be mandatory.

• It is already the policy of many fertility clinics (and recommended by the HFEA Code of Practice) to require legal advice for those having surrogacy treatment, albeit that only a few require both the surrogate and the intended parents to have separate advice.

• There is a crucial difference between the current law and the proposals for the new 'pathway', which is that the parties will, going forward, be entering into a legally-recognised arrangement. The agreement will have consequences in respect of parenthood, and will also be enforceable in respect of the financial terms. In that context it is important that everyone is clear about their legal status, rights and responsibilities before proceeding.

• Independent legal advice, like counselling, is a safeguard which helps ensure informed consent and protects against coercion. That reduces the risk of unethical arrangements, and of disputes, which could have significant implications for the child.
We have the following thoughts about how this could work in practice:
• The regulated surrogacy organisation, before ratifying the validity of a surrogacy agreement, should be satisfied that all parties have had legal advice from a qualified lawyer.

• We think it is important that legal advice is provided by a qualified lawyer. Although surrogacy organisations and support groups share legal information via peer-support, we have regular and ongoing experience of incorrect advice being given, even by experienced organisations.

• We have also seen lawyers who are not experienced in surrogacy giving incorrect advice, and so considered whether there should be a requirement for the advising lawyer to have experience in surrogacy. However, there is no obvious legal accreditation (similar to the counselling accreditation being recommended) which could be used, and we therefore agree that there should be reliance on the general regulatory rule from the Solicitors Regulation Authority that solicitors should not practice outside their areas of expertise. However, it may be possible for this to evolve through the regulatory system over time.

77 Consultation Question 69:

Other

Please provide your views below:

We agree with this proposal, as a sensible safeguarding measure for the welfare of the child and to give public confidence. We would not wish to see any offence preclude someone from having a child through surrogacy or being a surrogate, but we think the offences which preclude someone from adopting are appropriate for surrogacy, and that it is also sensible to give surrogacy organisations a wider discretion.

It would be helpful if licensed surrogacy organisations could themselves be given the power to request criminal records checks (with the consent of the individual) to ensure that any report is current.

78 Consultation Question 70: We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

We do not think that the law should require a surrogate to have previously given birth, but this might be a question which could be considered in developing regulatory guidance:

• At Brilliant Beginnings we, as policy, require all our surrogates to have given birth before. As a protective 'belt and braces' agency, we want to minimise risk wherever possible. Our rationale in applying this policy is that a surrogate who has experienced pregnancy before is potentially more able to give informed consent to becoming a surrogate. From a medical perspective, it also gives us a track record showing she is capable of carrying a pregnancy successfully and giving us information we can use to assess whether surrogacy would pose an unacceptable medical or psychological risk to her. We are also mindful of the possible risk of a surrogate not ever being able to carry a child of her own if the surrogacy impairs her fertility in some way.

• However, we recognise that these are perceived risks rather than being based on clear evidence. We recognise that other surrogacy organisations in the UK (which take a slightly less risk-averse approach to us) have worked with childless surrogates successfully, and have applied additional steps to protect against the risks set out above. As we have no experience of doing so ourselves, we do not feel able to judge the effectiveness of their processes. We are also mindful that none of our legal experience suggests that surrogacy arrangements involving childless surrogates are more problematic.

• Overall, we think that if there is to be policy on this issue it may be better to kept to regulatory guidance rather than being a legal requirement. However, we would defer to the views of those who have more experience of working with childless surrogates.

79 Consultation Question 71: We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree that there should be no fixed maximum number of surrogate pregnancies. The underlying concern here is whether a surrogate pregnancy will be safe for the surrogate and the child and we think that is best assessed on an individualised basis through medical screening.

Chapter 15: Payments to the Surrogate: Options for Reform

80 Consultation Question 72:

Not Answered

Please provide your views below:

Our overall view on payments is that surrogates and intended parents should be free to make whatever financial arrangements they consider appropriate, and that the law (which has limited power to regulate this) should encourage clarity and transparency as far as possible. We therefore think that the HFEA Code of Practice should set out guidance on what the surrogacy agreement should address, and this should include agreement on financial arrangements having considered the various potential categories the Law Commission has identified, as well other key issues (such as how many embryos will be transferred, decisions around termination etc). We do not think the law needs to mention payments at a statutory level.

In line with this, we think that parents and surrogates should be able to choose whether payments are agreed on an allowance or itemised basis and whether they want receipts to be produced.

Please see our response to Question 86 for further comment.

81 Consultation Question 73:

Please provide your views below:

Yes, in line with our view that there should be choice and transparency, intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate her essential costs and this should be set out clearly in the agreement.

Please see our response to Question 86 regarding our proposal that the Law Commission categories are used as guidance in the HFEA Code of Practice rather than for legal boundaries. If the categorisation sets legal limits, then we think giving a clear definition of what is permitted under this heading may be problematic, even though this is the most narrowly-drawn category. For example, how do you properly quantify the additional food a surrogate eats as a result of being pregnant from a household family food budget?

82 Consultation Question 74:

Please provide your views below:

Yes, in line with our view that there should be choice and transparency, intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate her additional pregnancy costs if she wishes, and these should be set out clearly in the agreement.

Please see our response to Question 86 regarding our proposal that the Law Commission categories are used as guidance in the HFEA Code of Practice rather than for legal boundaries. Otherwise, if a clear legal definition of permissible additional pregnancy costs is needed, we struggled with translating one into practice as against the other pregnancy-related categories. We see the rationale and the examples given, but we think it would be difficult to define this with any clarity.

83 Consultation Question 75:

Please provide your views below:

Yes, in line with our view that there should be choice and transparency, intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate her surrogacy costs if she wishes, and these should be set out clearly in the agreement.

If it is necessary to define this category to set a legal limit (rather than to use it merely for guidance), we also think that this will be problematic. Costs paid in connection with a surrogacy is in practice defined by what has become customary and that is likely to escape any clear legal definition. The payment of recuperative holidays is a prime example. Although there is a rationale for saying a surrogate deserves to re-bond with her family after a surrogacy (making this a customary surrogacy cost) it is difficult to define costs like this on the basis of them being connected with the surrogacy. What if a surrogate doesn't want to go on holiday after the birth but to put the money towards a bigger trip next year? What if she prefers to buy a new car instead (which will help her take her family on trips out)? What if a house extension would give them more space to re-bond as a family? While we think all this should be permissible if agreed on a clear and informed basis, we don't think it is helpful for people to have to shoe-horn what they want to do into acceptable categories, and it is more straightforward and transparent to agree a compensatory sum which the surrogate can spend on whatever she wishes.

84 Consultation Question 76: We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

Please provide your views below:

Yes, intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate her actual lost earnings (and those of her partner).

It may be difficult to quantify actual lost earnings if the surrogate or her partner is self-employed or receives a variable income of any kind. This is not problematic if the category is guidance, since the parties can simply agree a daily rate which seems fair (or whatever alternative quantification method they prefer). However, if it sets a boundary as to what is lawful there will need to be a detailed legal definition of what is and is not permissible.

85 Consultation Question 77:

Please provide your views below:

Yes, in line with our view that all payments should be permissible, we think that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate (and her partner) lost earnings potential if they wish.

However, we think that this is a potentially problematic category because potential earnings are so uncertain. Guidance in the HFEA Code of Practice should therefore encourage a clear accounting approach and/or a cap to ensure that everything is clear what they are committing to.

86 Consultation Question 78:

Please provide your views below:

We have limited experience of benefits issues in practice since none (or almost none) of our Brilliant Beginnings surrogates receive means-tested benefits, and this is an issue we have had limited direct involvement in from a legal perspective.

However, we understand that it is a significant concern for other UK surrogacy organisations which support many surrogates who are on benefits, and who are concerned about managing loss of entitlement. We therefore have two suggestions for resolving this:

• The law could provide that all payments made in accordance with a surrogacy agreement endorsed under the UK pathway are not classified as income or benefit for the purposes of taxation or benefits entitlement. This would be similar to special arrangements in place for other types of payments for social good, such as fostering payments. There would then be no loss of benefits in a surrogacy case. This would be our favoured option, and we think it is justified on public policy grounds given the wish to encourage and support UK surrogacy.

• Alternatively the HFEA Code of Practice could help surrogates who receive benefits achieve clarity by requiring the agreement to be drafted in such a way that payments would be defined in categories which would be understood and accepted by the benefits agency. This would give allow surrogacy teams to choose whether to:

• agree financial terms within allowable categories, with confidence that the surrogate's benefits entitlement will not be affected, or

• agree payments outside those categories and plan for any lost benefits appropriately (as they do for lost income).

87 Consultation Question 79:

pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;, medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or, specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

Please provide your views below:

Yes, in line with our view that all payments should be permissible, we think that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate (and her partner) compensation for all the items set out (and anything else they wish) and that the amount should be left to the parties to negotiate.

The list looks like it would cover anything for which compensation might be paid, other than an inconvenience fee for expressing breast milk for the intended parents after the birth which we have also seen paid in practice.

We do not think that it possible for a compensatory figure to be set by a regulator. Regulation will only control the pre-conception steps necessary to comply with the pathway and will not have control over what happens afterwards since, unlike in gamete donation, the parties have a direct relationship and manage payments between themselves. We cannot see how a regulator would be able to apply any sanctions if any cap was exceeded, and we are concerned about creating rules which are not enforceable (see our response to Question 87). The principle effect of the regulator stipulating a 'capped' figure for compensation would be to limit what could be recorded in the written agreement which is signed off by the regulated organisation. However, there would be an obvious risk of payments being made outside what was recorded with no way of the regulated organisation knowing or controlling that. That could significantly undermine the safeguarding effect of having a clear written agreement.

88 Consultation Question 80: We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

Please provide your views below:

Yes, in line with our view that all payments should be permissible, we think that intended parents should be able to pay compensation for death. It is already routinely expected for intended parents to pay for wills and life insurance so we doubt this will be controversial.

89 Consultation Question 81:

Please provide your views below:

Yes, in line with our view that all payments should be permissible, we think that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate (and her partner) whatever gifts they choose (and vice versa). We do not, however, think this is a category of payments which should be included in the agreement since the essence of gifts is that they are gratuitous and often spontaneous. They should therefore be outside the surrogacy agreement and not subject to any regulatory control.

Our legal experience is that the High Court does not consider that gifts are caught by section 54(8) at all (since they are not made 'in consideration of' the handover of the child etc). Therefore, it is permissible under the current law to pay gifts of any amount and this does not even need to be authorised by the court to make a parental order. Any new restriction would be a retrograde step and we do not think it is reasonable, or possible, for the law to seek to regulate gifts. Saying they must be 'modest' will simply create anxiety about what is lawful, rather than allowing natural gift-making within a close emotional relationship which people feel is appropriate.

This was one of the areas which intended parents expressed to us was particularly anxiety-provoking. One of our Brilliant Beginnings parents told us that every time he bought a cup of coffee for his surrogate, or wanted to do something nice for her children, during the surrogacy process he felt anxious about the impact it might have on the parental order. He said: "We had a very profound emotional relationship and to think that the state interfered in that and said whether or not we could buy her a present was ridiculous and intrusive."

90 Consultation Question 82:

It should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

Please provide your views below:

Yes, in line with our view that all payments should be permissible, we think that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate a fee for her gestational surrogacy services if she wishes to receive one. We do not think there is a significant distinction between paying compensation for the pain in inconvenience of pregnancy or a fee for gestational services other than in the labelling:

• Every one of the Brilliant Beginnings surrogates we consulted said that they thought the payment of a fee should be a surrogate's choice and not prohibited by law, even though they gave mixed responses as to whether they would personally want to charge a fee for their services. One surrogate said: "Ultimately a surrogate can decide for herself if she feels a fee for her service is something she wants to include, and she should not have justify this to anyone." Another said: "There needs to be room for choice and the law needs to be realistic." Some felt that strongly this issue went to the heart of the law needing to recognise that surrogates were autonomous women who were able to make their own rational choices.

• Both surrogates and intended parents were frustrated with the perceived dishonesty of the current system, which they recognised actually does allow reward payments already. One surrogate said: "I did something I wanted to do and the expenses benefited me, given that I didn't have to use them on actual expenses. If I had then I would have felt that it was a lot to do for very little over the two year period my life was affected." An intended parent said: "We paid a fixed amount of £15,000 because that was what we felt was fair, and I could never get my head around the fact that the law said that was ok but also said that we should only pay expenses but we all knew that it couldn't be justified as actual expenses".

We think that the amount of any fee should be agreed freely between the parties. For the reasons set out in our response to Question 79, we think it is impractical for an amount to be set by the regulator.

We think the parties should be able to choose whether any fee is paid in addition to other categories of expenses or not:

• It is commonplace in UK surrogacy for a lump sum to be agreed which is a mix of expenses and a fee/compensation. This is mainly as a result of COTS policy, which has filtered out to independent groups as well, and is the origin of the believed accepted amount of £12,000 to £15,000 which is often talked about. Even disregarding the problems of enforcement, we do not think it would be appropriate to stipulate a figure like this for everyone (inclusive of expenses), since surrogates' circumstances differ and some may have expenses which exceed this figure. We think there should be choice.

• In practice, we would anticipate that if a fair sum could be freely agreed as a benefit to the surrogate (whether titled compensation or a fee) most teams would limit the expenses to a narrower range than is currently paid. By comparison in the US, the itemised expenses are typically £1,000 to £3,500 and the compensation is the much larger amount.

91 Consultation Question 83:

Please provide views below:

Any compensation for inconvenience, or fee for gestational services, should be appropriate to the surrogate's effort and time. It should therefore be permissible for the amount to be reduced if she miscarries or the pregnancy is terminated early, although possibly not after a certain stage of pregnancy.

Given international law rules prohibiting the sale of children, we think that the law should also say that any compensation or other payments agreed to be paid to a UK surrogate relate to her effort and inconvenience and are therefore due irrespective of whether a healthy child is delivered or handed over (this can be part of the provisions on enforceability).

92 Consultation Question 84: We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

Without any proposals to change the parental order framework in relation to payments, we assume that the Law Commission envisages retaining the court's power to 'authorise' payments outside the permitted framework. That must be the case since otherwise all international surrogacy cases would be excluded from parental orders, and that is clearly not envisaged. As we have seen from extensive case law, the power of authorisation is exercised routinely in the majority of surrogacy cases and is no longer controversial. What the parental order framework 'permits' is therefore not just expenses reasonably incurred but whatever payments are agreed between the parties.

If there is to be parity within the new pathway, all categories of payments should be permitted.

93 Consultation Question 85: We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

Please provide your views below:

We think the categories are a good summary from which nothing has been obviously omitted however this should never be the exhaustive or definitive list.

94 Consultation Question 86: We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

Please provide your views below:

We think that surrogates and intended parents should be free to make whatever financial arrangements they consider appropriate, whether by allowance or itemisation and in any of the categories the Law Commission has set out. Some surrogates want to benefit and many intended parents want to support that, and they should have the choice to do so.

We think the focus of the law should be on avoiding exploitation (through the pre-conception steps in the pathway and judicial oversight outside it) and on encouraging clarity and transparency which minimise the risk of communication difficulties during the surrogacy process.

We think the Law Commission's categories are helpful guidance, and should be used (through the regulation system) to help surrogates and intended parents consider everything and put in place a clear written agreement. The HFEA Code of Practice could therefore require licence-holders, before certifying compliance with the pathway, to ensure that the written surrogacy agreement properly addresses all the key issues which the regulator identifies as being important. As well as financial arrangements, this would include things like how decision-making will be managed if there needs to be a termination, the numbers of embryos to be transferred etc.
Feedback from our community of surrogates and intended parents:

• The Brilliant Beginnings surrogates and intended parents we consulted welcomed the Law Commission categories, which they thought would be useful practical guidance to aid surrogacy teams in their discussions around the financial arrangements. One surrogate, who had previously been a surrogate outside Brilliant Beginnings, felt that the ethos of keeping expenses as low as possible at Surrogacy UK had meant that when difficulties arose during the pregnancy she had been left to cover the unanticipated costs. She thought that the thoroughness of the Law Commission categories would help prevent this for others.

• None of those we consulted thought that any of the categories should be prohibited by law. One surrogate said: Is it in the best interests of the child or surrogate or parents to have it itemised or limited? No." Another surrogate said "I think everyone involved should just be better protected. Perhaps there could be some guidelines around payments that provide help to IPs budgeting and people considering becoming a surrogate to help them assess what might be involved. To me each IP and each surrogate are going to have circumstances unique to them so I think ultimately it should be a decision made together so that everyone feels comfortable."

• Intended parents felt that, with the introduction of regulation, there was no justification for setting a limit, and that it would not be enforceable anyway. One said: "The pathway will ensure that women are not exploited so why is the state enforcing a limit. What is the justification? With the ability of the state to enforce this being zero."

• There was also considerable frustration about the prominence of a small group of surrogates at Surrogacy UK arguing for a restrictive framework. One surrogate said: "We really need to change the conversation". An intended parent said: "A small body at Surrogacy UK are forcing their dogma on generations to come."

Practical analysis of managing payments from our Brilliant Beginnings experience:

• Payments is the most problematic issue for UK surrogates and intended parents. People don't like to talk about money, and it can be challenging to get them to agree details clearly. However, the risks associated with not doing so are enormous, and we have seen communication difficulties arise in practice due to lack of clarity. We find that the problems are exacerbated by anxiety around the parental order and the fact that agreements are written by the parties themselves without legal precision.

• We are occasionally approached by surrogates who appear to be primarily motivated by financial gain, but they very quickly screen themselves out of the process once they understand the level of time, commitment and effort involved. We find that surrogates who are not motivated by altruism and the desire to help someone else simply do not proceed. However, some surrogates do also expect some financial benefit, often in wanting to benefit their own families, and these typically agree an overall sum which is for more than their actual expenses. We support informed choice and we promote openness and transparency.

• We deal with a large number of US surrogacy agreements where compensation is paid more clearly. Agreement over the financial element is usually straightforward – there is a compensation figure plus a modest monthly allowance for expenses (usually $200) and a small number of identified expenses specifically reimbursed (lost earnings, prescription charges), all of which is set out transparently in the lawyer-drafted agreement. Payments are then managed through an escrow account so the parties do not need to administer them themselves and the surrogate has security that her costs will be paid. This system results in significantly less anxiety, confusion and miscommunication than the UK framework.

• We also deal with Canadian surrogacy arrangements where the law criminalises the payment of more than expenses and we see similar difficulties to the UK. Agreements commonly set a 'capped fee' which the surrogate is supposed to show receipt-evidenced expenses to claim. However, there is no oversight of the payments after the agreement is made, and in reality the expense figure is always paid in full on the basis of the surrogate producing receipts showing that all her household outgoings (not just expenses relating to the surrogacy) exceed this. We were also involved in a case in which an agency put forward a surrogate who was asking for significantly higher than normal sum on the basis that the lawyers drafting the agreement would be told one figure and the rest would be paid outside it. Interestingly the surrogate ultimately withdrew from the process when pressed about the validity of this.

• We see no evidence that the payment of compensation adversely affects the quality of the intended parents' relationship with their surrogate. Our intended parents who go to the US usually form very close bonds with their surrogates, just like those going through UK surrogacy, and US surrogates are typically motivated by the desire to help and form a relationship in a very similar way to UK surrogates. In one case we dealt with, a US surrogate surprised the parents with a letter which was read at their final parental order hearing by their judge saying how grateful she was that she had 'expanded her family by three'. The quality of relationships in US surrogacy is supported by the research we did with Cambridge University which showed (V Jadva, N Gamble and H Prosser, Parents' relationship with their surrogate in cross-border and domestic surrogacy arrangements, Fertility and Sterility, March 2019).

• The Surrogacy UK model is more restrictive than the law currently allows. We do not think there is any justification for what is a policy decision of one surrogacy organisation becoming a legal requirement for everyone, however vocal their advocates. There are many quieter and more moderate surrogates and intended parents outside Surrogacy UK who feel differently but often feel unable to express their views openly. We should also not discount the unknown voices of potential future surrogates who might come forward in a more liberal system.

• We are mindful that Surrogacy UK is very open about the fact that the majority of its surrogates (we understand 90%+) are on means-tested benefits. It is easy to understand why such surrogates may not want their payments to be classified as anything other than expenses since it could affect their benefits, incur additional costs for their intended parents (in covering their lost income) and inconveniently require them to withdraw and reapply for benefits. However, that is not a justification for dictating that this should apply to everyone, and the benefits issue does not reflect the experience of Brilliant Beginnings surrogates. We also think that, if the state is in reality providing women means-tested benefits while they receive payments for surrogacy, that should be managed more openly and transparently (see our response to Question 78).

• When we first set up Brilliant Beginnings, we took great effort to adhere to the law by ensuring that we only gave guidelines rather than being prescriptive in relation to expenses. We have always ensured that clear budgets are set and understood and that a baseline for dealing with the unpredictable elements of a pregnancy and surrogacy are addressed. We help surrogates understand their expenses at the outset before they are matched so that intended parents are both able to afford whatever those costs might be, but are also able to budget, and none of our surrogates are ever left out of pocket. We allow people the space to agree a top up or an overall lump sum if they want to accommodate some compensation, although we give both surrogates and intended parents separate independent legal advice so they can understand the implications of whatever they agree for their parental order. The payments are again evaluated against the reality around the 20 week pregnancy stage and then again post birth. At every juncture, there is discomfort and hesitancy with what has been paid/ or received in spite of the fact that every journey has never mirrored another.

• We have also heard the argument that a child born through surrogacy where payments have been made would feel sullied and their self-esteem affected. This does not reflect our experience, in the context of having worked for many years with intended parents engaging in compensated surrogacy arrangements in the US as well as those compensating surrogates in the UK, and it is not reflected in the research done by Cambridge University which has included children of commercial surrogacy arrangements overseas. It is obviously key that the words surrounding the story of how a child comes into the world needs care to reflect the true sentiment behind conception and pregnancy but this can be managed well, and in practice we see parents talking about balance in surrogacy relationships where each side is able to benefit and support the other's family.

Legal analysis from NGA Law:

• All the categories of payments set out by the Law Commission are already lawful and routinely paid within the existing UK legal framework. We have dealt with hundreds of international surrogacy cases involving commercial surrogacy arrangements in which payments have been retrospectively authorised. This is now so routine (and based on such clear case law) that the exercise is near-meaningless, and simply creates an evidential burden for applicants. In UK surrogacy cases heard before magistrates, payments are hardly ever queried even where no justification or breakdown is given. It is common for teams to agree a lump sum (usually of £12,000 to £20,000) which is for more than just expenses. We are from time to time asked by intended parents 'what figure the court would like to hear' and we suspect that there is a significant amount of non-disclosure. We have had three cases (roughly 1/100) in which payments were queried by the CAFCASS officer (one being the non-disclosure case of Re A, B and C (2016)). In all the payments were authorised by the court. Any restriction of payments is therefore both unenforceable and unenforced.

• We think more realistic law which encourages openness, clarity and transparency is a much better way forward. While the Law Commission's categories will be useful as guidance, if any categories are prohibited by law the definitions become critical and there is a significant risk that we simply replace one complicated and blurred division with several.

• We think the real underlying concern here is the worry that women may be exploited if given a financial incentive to enter into an arrangement which they later regret or are harmed by. However, the protective measures being introduced through regulation and the pathway will significantly promote informed consent and minimise risk, and we think this is an appropriate justification (as well as realism) to taking a more realistic and liberal approach to payments.

95 Consultation Question 87:

Please provide your views below:

We do not think there are any methods of enforcement which will successfully limit payments to surrogates. This reality needs to be understood and accepted so the law can focus on protecting all involved by promoting clarity and transparency and ensuring informed consent.

In respect of cases outside the pathway:

• Most cases outside the pathway will be international surrogacy cases. It is not possible for UK law to regulate what surrogates in other countries can be paid.

• The status quo is untenable. Although the family court is supposed to regulate payments, it does not do so since the parental order is considered after the event in the context of an application in which the child's welfare is the court's paramount consideration. We have extensive and established case law addressing the 'irreconcilably conflicting' legal task judges are given and articulating that a parental order could never be refused. We also now have a legacy of hundreds of cases in which payments have been authorised and none in which a parental order has been refused. If the law is being brought up to date, we cannot knowingly retain legislation which serves no purpose and has been demonstrated and declared to be unworkable. The idea that the family court can regulate payments is a fiction.

• Criminal sanctions for parents and surrogates were (rightly) rejected in 1985, as being something which might taint the conception of a child. We do not think anyone is proposing that they be introduced, but we would oppose this as being draconian and unjustified.

• The reality is therefore that it is not possible to enforce limits on payments made to surrogates in cases which fall outside the pathway.

In respect of cases within the pathway:

• We question whether there is any logical justification for the law being enforced only in those cases where safeguarding steps have been followed which better protect against exploitation, and not in relation to international surrogacy arrangements and UK surrogacy arrangements outside the pathway where there are no such protections. This feels like a double standard.

• We do not think there is any effective means of enforcing restrictions in the pathway either. The options would seem to be:

1. Regulatory control – In gamete donation, limits on payments to donors are enforced through the HFEA licence control of regulated bodies. However, in gamete donation licensed bodies have complete control over the donation process and act as an intermediary between parties who have no direct contact. That is not the case in surrogacy. A regulated surrogacy organisation will have some involvement in a surrogacy up to the point where the agreement is signed off. However, both before and after, the parties will have a direct relationship and will be responsible for making payments privately between them. As individuals, they are not subject to regulatory control. Therefore any attempt to enforce limits via regulation will likely only really dictate what can be told to the regulated surrogacy organisation (and so what is included in the surrogacy agreement), and not what is actually paid. We would be concerned about creating a system which effectively incentivises written agreements which may not reflect everything the parties have agreed, and which injects a possible secret into a highly-charged emotional relationship. We think this presents a very significant risk to the protective value of the pathway steps, and so may be counter-productive.

2. Disqualification from the pathway – It is difficult to see how this would be triggered unless the parties were so honest in their agreement that they effectively volunteered themselves out of the pathway. If there is ongoing oversight of payments made, it is unclear how that would be done and who would do it. Again, there would be incentive for payments to be made off-record. We would also be concerned that certainty in respect of a child's parentage could be undermined, for example if someone (perhaps one of the parents following a separation) raised an issue later about payments having breached the rules so that parenthood was not conferred in the absence of a parental order.

3. Criminalisation – There has been some suggestion that a 'softer' method of enforcement might be requiring the parents to sign a statutory declaration when registering the birth confirming that they have only made permitted payments. This is still effectively criminalisation, which we reject as draconian and unjustified, and something which may taint the birth of the child.

96 Consultation Question 88:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree that the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement under the pathway should be enforceable by and against the surrogate.

Other

Please provide your views below:

We agree that payment of expenses incurred should be payable regardless of any terms concerning lifestyle. However, we do think there may be a case for financial sanctions in respect of any purely compensatory element in some circumstances, for example where a surrogate knowingly ignores an agreement not to travel outside the country in the late stages of the pregnancy, and this results in the child being born overseas and very significant medical and legal costs for the intended parents as a result.

99 Consultation Question 91: We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

Please provide your views below:

As part of NGA Law's legal services we advise on and apply for British nationality registration and/or passports for children born through surrogacy, and we have dealt with 53 such applications. We are also aware of what happens in cases where parents apply themselves from the country of birth, since immigration delays often affect the parental order application which we are managing.

Our experience of the process of obtaining British nationality/passports in surrogacy cases is as follows:

Surrogacy in the US/Canada

All children are born American/Canadian citizens and so UK parents almost invariably apply for a US/Canadian passport and use this to travel home. They usually return home 1-4 weeks after the birth with no official UK documentation. Although technically the children have no right of entry (since they are not US visitors), this is tolerated by Border Control. Of the hundreds of US/Canadian surrogacy cases we have been involved in, 95% follow this route and no parents have been denied entry at the border. However, lots feel anxious about their child's lack of rights on entry, and a few have been questioned at the border and made to feel very uncomfortable.
Since the grant of a parental order will confer British nationality and should make a UK passport application straightforward, the standard advice is to wait until the parental order is granted to apply for a British passport. However, some parents choose to apply for British nationality/passport separately, either because they want a British passport for their child more quickly or because they are not applying for a parental order (e.g. non-biological parents, non-domiciled British parents and, historically, single parents).

In these cases it works as follows:

• If the child is born British by descent (typically where the biological father is British other than by descent and the surrogate is unmarried), we can apply for a British passport directly. The Passport Office states that it expects to see extensive original documents relating to the surrogacy, but in practice we see enormous variety in what documents are required. In some cases applications are granted smoothly even where the documents on the list cannot be provided; in others, the Passport Office requests additional documents not on the list.

• If the child is not born British (for example where the surrogate is married or where we are applying on the basis of the mother/non-biological father being British) we first need to apply to the Home Office for British nationality registration. Applications usually fall under the Home Office's discretionary power, but sometimes are as of right (e.g. where the biological father is British by descent). We have never had an application refused, and have made applications in cases both where the policy criteria apply and in a few where they do not. The nationality policy is incredibly complicated to follow. There seem to be no underpinning policy principles and no alignment with wider surrogacy/family law in respect of the language or requirements, which are different depending on whether it is the biological father, mother or non-biological father who is British. The policy is then overlaid by another very complex set of rules if the parent is British by descent.

We have also dealt with a number of US surrogacy cases in which parents have experienced difficulties obtaining a British passport application after the grant of a parental order. In one, an application was wrongly rejected by the Passport Office on the basis that the child was not British because the surrogate was married. Since a parental order makes a child British if either of the parents is British, the only supporting evidence needed is the parental order and evidence of either parent's British nationality. However, the Passport Office do not seem to understand this and frequently ask for now-irrelevant documents e.g. evidence relating to the surrogacy or to the child's grandparents' circumstances.

Timescales are variable but much quicker in US/Canadian surrogacy cases than in ones involving other jurisdictions (approximately 3-6 weeks for each application).

Ukraine/Georgia

In Ukraine and Georgia, the child is not entitled to nationality of the country of birth. Therefore, there is no local passport and no easy route home which circumvents the need to first make a British passport application (unless, as is sometimes the case, the parents have other EU nationalities).

We dealt with the case of Re X and Y (2008) in which the Ukrainian surrogate was married and the children were born stateless (and in which we applied for a visa outside the Immigration Rules). The case had a lot of publicity, and Ukrainian and Georgian surrogacy service-providers became wise to the need to match British intended parents with unmarried surrogates. Since the case of Re IJ (2011) (which also involved a married surrogate) we have therefore not seen any Ukrainian/Georgian surrogacy cases in which the surrogate was married.

This means that the usual route home for UK parents with children born through surrogacy in Ukraine or Georgia is a British passport application on the basis that the child is born British by descent via a British father.

This has applied in all the cases we have dealt with, bar one in which the intended mother, but not the father, was British (these parents could not apply for British nationality registration since there is no court orer in the Ukraine, and instead applied for a visa).

The process of obtaining a British passport in Ukraine/Georgia is lengthy, taking 3-5 months on average even if managed efficiently, and it must be made in Ukraine/Georgia which means that parents make the applications themselves.

We have also experienced the Passport Office not understanding the impact of a parental order in this context. In a recent case we have dealt with, the parents had tried to apply for a British passport in Ukraine but were unable to produce the extensive (original) identity documents for their surrogate requested because they were no longer in contact with her. They therefore obtained an alternative EU passport to which the child was entitled which they used to travel home and then applied for a parental order. When we subsequently re-applied for their child's UK passport after the parental order was granted, the Passport Office was extremely difficult, insisting that the documents from the surrogate had to be provided and asking us to file all the evidence which had been provided to the High Court so the Passport Office could decide whether the parental order had been properly made (which we successfully opposed).

India

Although Indian surrogacy cases are now largely historic, they were very common in the past. Most parents applied for British nationality/passports themselves given the need to make the application in India. We had repeating experience that it was very difficult to establish to the Passport Office's satisfaction that a surrogate was unmarried, and so it became standard practice to apply to the Home Office for British nationality registration first even if strictly speaking that was not required.

Applications took an enormous amount of time (up to 19 months, in our experience) and this was the cause of considerable distress to new parents. The main delay was in the passport stage, with British nationality typically granted within a few weeks of the application being made.

100 Consultation Question 92: We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree that it should be possible for a file to be opened prior to the birth in order to reduce delays, and we would suggest that it should be possible to open the file for both this application and the passport application prior to the birth (even if the child will not be born British) since the principal delay in dual-application cases is in the second passport stage. However, we think that if the visa rules are improved, this may be the better solution for getting newborn born through surrogacy overseas home promptly.

In respect of British nationality we also have some further comments. Although the Law Commission has not recommended any changes to British nationality law we do not think that is feasible in light of the Law Commission's wider proposals, and that the following amendments (at least) should be considered:

• Section 50(9) and (9A) British Nationality Act 1981 will need to be amended to include legal parents via the pathway in the definitions of 'mother' and 'father' so that parents through surrogacy are able to transmit British nationality to their child in the same way they would if their child was not born through surrogacy. This is particularly important given that there will be no parental order, and so a burden to apply for British nationality registration (which is much more expensive than a parental order) could in some cases be inadvertently imposed on families through UK surrogacy who would not otherwise have had to do this.

• Similarly, the definitions should be amended to include parents who are recognised as legal parents because their surrogacy took place in a country recognised by the Secretary of State's power. (We appreciate that this will be slightly different to recognised overseas adoption orders, but we think this is justified given that surrogate children are the parents' natural children).

• If a policy decision is made to provide that a surrogate's spouse is not a legal parent at birth, this should be reflected in the section 50(9A) BNA 1981 definition of 'father' as well as in the HFEA 2008. In non-pathway and non-recognition cases, this would enable the biological father to pass on British nationality irrespective of whether the surrogate is married, ending the arbitrary distinction related to marital status and the related evidential burden for parents.

• Section 50(9A) has previously been amended to include people who are now recognised as legal parents by virtue of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 2008, so such changes are not unprecedented and do not require a wholesale review of British nationality law.

• We also think that, where British nationality registration is required, surrogate-born children should be able to be registered as of right, rather than by Home Office discretion, and that the policy should be re-written to make it clearer and policy-based. We would suggest that it simply says that where a parent through surrogacy who is British (and would otherwise be able to transmit British nationality to a child born abroad) is a legal parent of a child in the country of birth (evidenced by a birth certificate, court order or affidavit from a lawyer) his or her child will be registered as a British citizen. This is essentially what the policy already provides, but simpler.

101 Consultation Question 93: We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

Please provide your views below:

There is provision for a visa application made outside the Immigration Rules under a specific surrogacy policy. To obtain the visa, parents have to show that they intend to apply for a parental order and are likely to be granted one. To the best of our recollection, this has only been used in four cases of ours: Re X and Y (2008), Re IJ (2011), one early US case (approx. 2010) and a recent Ukraine case in which the intended mother was British but the father was not. The applications took 6-12 weeks to process.

102 Consultation Question 94:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Yes we agree that the current surrogacy visa should be possible to apply for pre-birth and should be formalised within the Immigration Rules. We also agree that the criteria should be reviewed to be more appropriate and to wider policy in relation to surrogacy and any changes to the parental order criteria:

• We have thought for some time that the visa process for surrogacy could be improved to allow pre-birth applications which could be approved promptly on birth to eliminate the delays bringing surrogate-born children home to the UK. Not only would this safeguard the welfare of children; it would also be joined-up in respect of encouraging parents to apply for a parental order to resolve children's nationality and parentage properly.

• We in fact suggested exactly this in March 2015 in a paper we were asked to write for the cross-border government working group on surrogacy. We are happy to send you this document, which sets out more detail about how this could work and the possible policy benefits, and which remains on point.

103 Consultation Question 95:We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We have no direct experience of applying for EU EFFs, but in line with other questions we would support pre-birth applications to enable speed of resolution.

104 Consultation Question 96: We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

Please provide your views below:

We have no direct experience of this.

105 Consultation Question 97: We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We wholeheartedly agree with this proposal. The current guidance is horrendously complicated and located across several different documents which in places contradict each other and even refer to section 30 of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 which has not been in force since 2010.

We think any guidance should be clear about the steps which should be taken to enter the UK with a child born through surrogacy in the UK, and the different routes to British nationality. It should take reflect family law accurately, both to the extent that family law provisions and processes affect nationality, but also in order to highlight wider issues which parents should be aware of in a joined-up way. Finally the guidance on the documentation which needs to be provided in support of each application should be set out clearly in one place.

106 Consultation Question 98: We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

We do not agree. We propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to ratify surrogacy agreements made in other jurisdictions if able and willing to confirm that the pathway steps have been properly followed:

• Brilliant Beginnings routinely works with parents going to the US and Canada for surrogacy, and these arrangements involve safeguarding measure which are at least as stringent as the pathway steps recommended for the UK. COTS and Surrogacy UK do not facilitate overseas arrangements, but they do work from time to time with intended parents whose embryo transfers take place at clinics outside the UK, usually because the parents already have leftover embryos stored there, or for reasons of cost.

• We think it should be possible for a regulated surrogacy organisation in the UK to be able to certify that an overseas arrangement (or an arrangement in which there are some overseas elements) has complied with the pathway. This would not be a light 'sign off' but would require the UK organisation to have proper oversight of the arrangement. The organisation would need to be able to confirm that medical screening had been carried out properly, and that independent legal advice had been given in all relevant jurisdictions. It would then itself carry out the criminal records check and the welfare of the child assessment, it would arrange implications counselling in the UK, and it would provide information for the national surrogacy register (recognising that it may not be possible to provide identifying information about gamete donors, but the best information available could be provided). Licencing conditions could control how this would work to ensure that arrangements properly complied with the pathway.

• This would have the massive advantage of introducing oversight of some international surrogacy arrangements upfront. It would incentivise parents to choose more ethical destinations (to avoid the need to apply for a parental order) and it would encourage them to take sensible steps which they might not otherwise do. In particular, parents who conceive through egg donation at overseas clinics are often not offered the kind of counselling which is routinely provided in the UK, and as a result are much less well prepared for the long term implications of sharing information with their child. By requiring the counselling to be done by an accredited UK counsellor as part of the pathway, such parents would be given this support.

• It would reduce the burden on the High Court to hear international surrogacy cases which are clear and straightforward.

• In policy terms, it would have a similar effect to the proposed Secretary of State power to designate acceptable jurisdictions with equivalent protections, but on a case by case basis until such a power is exercised.

• If those undertaking the surrogacy are not able or unwilling to enlist the support of the licensed organisation, or if the arrangement does not meet the appropriate pathway standards, they will fall out of the pathway and the PO route is available to them.

107 Consultation Question 99:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree with this proposal subject to the following thoughts:

• We would urge the government to conduct a review promptly in order to create a 'designated list' as quickly as possible. We are conscious that this exercise may not be straightforward, given that law and procedure on surrogacy is enormously variable in different countries/states/provinces and it may take some time to assess which jurisdictions have systems which are 'at least equivalent' to the UK. That is why we propose that in the meantime individual arrangements can be ratified by regulated UK surrogacy organisations as being equivalent on a case by case basis (please see our response to Question 98).

• It is important to consider how recognition will affect the transmission of British nationality. Given that in such cases children would otherwise become British on the grant of a parental order where either parent is British, we would suggest an amendment to the definitions of parents in s50(9)(9A) British Nationality Act 1981 so that a person who is a parent in a recognised overseas surrogacy arrangement can transmit his or her British nationality to a child at birth as they would a naturally-born child.

108 Consultation Question 100:

Please provide your views below:

We have been involved in a small number of cases in which parents from outside the UK have had a child with the help of a surrogate in the UK. Most of these (approximately 5-10) have involved uncompensated surrogacy arrangements between friends/family, and the parents' countries have included Australia, Ireland, New Zealand, the US and Switzerland.

We have also been involved in two recent cases involving Irish same-sex couples who matched with UK surrogates via Facebook groups without having had a prior relationship. We are also regularly approach by intended parents from outside the UK who hope to access UK surrogacy because it is prohibited or too expensive in their own country (although we usually encourage them to look elsewhere).
At present the legal advice is complicated.

• If the parents intend to apply for a parental order, or no order, in their home country then they only need the surrogate's written permission (and a passport) to remove the child from the UK. In such cases the surrogate's legal motherhood may never be properly extinguished, and it is important everyone consents to this.

• If the parents intend to apply to adopt their child in their home country they need the permission of the court under the Adoption and Children Act 2002. We have not yet been involved in a case where we have made a section 84 application to the court.

We have no strong view as to whether there should be a 'removal' process for outgoing surrogacy cases, but we think it may be difficult to design since there is no consistency between the legal processes parents follow in the destination country.

Chapter 17: Miscellaneous Issues

109 Consultation Question 101: We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

Please provide your views below:

We are not employment lawyers, but are aware that a surrogate's partner is not entitled to claim paternity leave, even though he or she often needs this time to care for the surrogate and their own family post-birth. We would support an extension of paternity leave to include this on the basis that the wider family plays a pivotal role in the surrogacy and there is a need for time and support in the readjustment back to family life.

110 Consultation Question 102: We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We agree that self-employed intended parents (who do not receive maternity leave/pay) should be entitled to claim maternity allowance as they would if they were giving birth to a child (and that where there are two intended parents they should be able to opt for which parent qualifies). This would bring the law for self-employed people into line with the rights already enjoyed by employees.

111 Consultation Question 103:

Please provide your views below:

We are not employment lawyers, but are aware that adoption (surrogacy) leave commences from birth and know that this causes difficulties for some parents (particularly those with children born overseas, where they want to go out in advance of the birth to ensure they can be present). We would welcome leave being able to commence at an appropriate time, and for intended parents to have time off work, in line with the employment and maternity leave entitlements they would have if giving birth to their child.

112 Consultation Question 104: We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

Please provide your views below:

This area of law is outside our area of legal expertise, but in general terms we would encourage support for any intended mothers who are following induced lactation to have the same rights as other breastfeeding mothers.

113 Consultation Question 105: We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

Please provude your views below:

No response – this is outside our area of expertise.

114 Consultation Question 106: We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

Please provide your views below:

One of the important implications of legal parenthood is the succession rights it confers. We therefore welcome all the proposals which will confer legal parenthood immediately from birth or without delay afterward.

In cases where the intended parents will be recognised as the legal parents from birth, it will no longer be necessary for the parties to put in place specialist wills which specifically benefit (or in the surrogate's case exclude) surrogate children. This will save cost for intended parents.

To the extent that there will remain cases in which surrogate-born people may not have a secure legal connection with their parents for the purposes of inheritance (either temporarily or long term) we wonder whether there should be a right to bring claims under the Inheritance (Provision for Family and Dependants) Act 1975 to enable a disenfranchised surrogate child to claim what he or she should be entitled too. Similarly we wonder if there should be provision for a surrogate's natural children to be able to contest a share to a sharing going to a surrogate-born child and thereby reducing their share.

We are not experts in contested inheritance, or succession generally, so these are general thoughts rather than specific legal recommendations.

115 Consultation Question 107:

Please provide your views below:

We would like to see fair access to NHS funding for IVF treatment by parents who need the help of a surrogate to conceive.

• At present, there is almost no NHS funding for IVF treatment, which adds significantly to the cost burden of intended parents. If surrogacy is accepted as a legitimate form of family-building there is no reason why it should not be considered a form of fertility treatment eligible for funding like any other.

We think there is a need for greater education, understanding and inclusion of surrogacy in maternity and other health services, to ensure that all parties are dealt with appropriately and respectfully.

• We have been involved in a number of cases in which referrals have been made to social services by hospitals and midwives, not because there are any welfare concerns but simply because a child has been handed over to intended parents by the surrogate. This is incredibly distressing to parents, as well as being an unnecessary waste of public resources.

• We have also been involved in several cases in which hospital decision-making in the context of a difficult delivery or a termination decision has been inappropriate, either by excluding one party or by presuming there is a dispute of some kind between the parties when there is not.

116 Consultation Question 108: We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

Please provide your views below:

We think that the Law Commission should consider more far-reaching reform to parental orders for both domestic and international surrogacy cases:

• Many of the existing criteria have (rightly) been undermined by judges struggling to reconcile their duty to regulate surrogacy retrospectively and to safeguard the welfare of a real child, to the point where the criteria are now largely meaningless. Please see our responses to Questions 54, 56 and 57 in respect of the six month deadline, the relationship status requirements and the authorisation of payments. We think these criteria should simply be removed.

• We also think reform is needed to several of the other criteria. The fact that a surrogate cannot give valid consent until 6 weeks after the birth, and the requirement that the child has already been handed over to the applicants, both reflect the 1980s policy concern that women may not be able to make a reliable commitment to carry a child for someone else. With 30 years' experience we now have a much more sophisticated understanding of surrogacy, and understand that its essence is not the post-birth handover of a child but a shared intention to conceive a child. Since this is (commendably) at the heart of the Law Commission's recommendations concerning the new pathway, we think it is illogical not to recognise that elsewhere. Even if non-pathway cases warrant a higher level of judicial oversight, we do not think that means that they are not surrogacy cases.

• We therefore think that, rather than tinkering at the edges, law reform should look afresh at the criteria and process for a parental order, taking as its starting point the modern understanding that surrogacy is about shared intention. We therefore suggest that, when the court is considering making a parental order, it should be required to consider:

o whether the court has jurisdiction to make an order (based on the residence or domicile of the intended parent/s), o whether the parties intended, at the time of conception, for the intended parent/s to be the legal parents of the child, o whether all parties consent fully, freely and unconditionally to the court making a parental order (with the court having the power to waive consent if in the child's best interests), and o the welfare of the child (this being the paramount consideration).
o There might also be criteria in respect of genetic connection and age, as the Law Commission proposes (we have said more about these elsewhere).

• In line with surrogacy being about shared intention, we think that a parental order should confer parenthood on the people who intended to be the child's parents when the child was conceived. We also think that it should be possible for the application to be brought by any of the intended parents, the surrogate or (if both intended parents have died) any guardian appointed for the child. This would enable legal parenthood to be confirmed at the request of the surrogate (if the intended parents fail to apply), or at the request of one intended parent in favour of the other (for example where one has died or they have separated). It would also enable legal parenthood to be confirmed posthumously in a case where both intended parents had died, so that the child's guardianship and inheritance rights could be properly conferred. This proposal would overcome the significant difficulties which arise where circumstances change (usually through death or separation) between the making of the surrogacy arrangement and the parental order.

• One key significance of our proposed criteria reform will be that it will be possible for the intended parent/s to make an application before their child is born. If the court is satisfied in relation to the criteria, it could make a pre-birth parental order, giving the child legal resolution from birth. Note that the order would only confer legal parenthood from the time of birth so this would not affect the surrogate's bodily autonomy during pregnancy. However, the court could also defer making an order until after the birth, giving scope to interrogate the surrogate's consent and investigate the child's welfare in more depth.

• In terms of procedure, we think that on issue of an application the court should automatically make directions in writing for the filing of evidence and a CAFCASS safeguarding report. We think that the welfare assessment carried out by the court should be proportionate: a basic safeguarding report as standard (which can be done pre or post birth), and a more thorough CAFCASS welfare report (which would have to be done post-birth) only where there is a justification.

• The court should then consider whether to make an order at the first hearing after this evidence is filed. Further hearings and/or a full (post-birth) CAFCASS welfare report should only be ordered by the court where they are needed. This would streamline the process, make the investigations more proportionate and significantly reduce delay for the child.

• We appreciate that the possibility of a pre-birth order goes further than the Law Commission is currently recommending. We therefore wish to emphasise that, even if this suggestion is not adopted, the court process can still be significantly streamlined. We recently, at his request, prepared a document for Mr Justice Hayden who was considering giving guidance about streamlining the parental order application process within the existing Family Procedure Rules. He was concerned about delay in parents obtaining parental responsibility, and keen to highlight that CAFCASS reports were not always necessary (he often dispenses with them in practice via directions). He ultimately decided to leave any recommendations to the Law Commission, but requested a document setting out the legal basis for what he thought should be best practice. Our document set out that the court could make standard directions when a parental order application was issued (for filing of evidence and a basic CAFCASS safeguarding report), and that the court could then consider making a final order at the first hearing, unless it needed further evidence or a full CAFCASS welfare report (in which case it could aware parental responsibility at the first hearing on an interim basis). Such a procedural change in fact does not require any law change and is permissible within the existing law and family procedure rules, but it would be helpful if it could be set out explicitly in the court procedure rules. We are happy to send you an anonymised copy if it would be helpful.

If international, in which country did the arrangement take place?:

Although we are not intended parents, we thought it may be helpful to give an overview of the experience of intended parents we have which are reflected in our responses.

NGA Law has advised (as paying clients) 1201 different sets of intended parents in relation to surrogacy journeys since 2009.

Brilliant Beginnings has advised or worked with 341 different sets of intended parents in relation to surrogacy journeys since 2013.

Together, the experience of these intended parents answers the questions above as follows:

• We have worked with families who have had children born through surrogacy in every year from 2001 to 2019 (with more expected).

• Approximately 1/3 of our cases have involved UK surrogacy arrangements (including surrogacy arrangements with Brilliant Beginnings, COTS, Surrogacy UK, the British Surrogacy Centre, other now-historic agencies, and independent arrangements).

• Approximately 2/3 of our cases have involved international surrogacy arrangements (including surrogacy arrangements in most US states and Canadian provinces, India, Ukraine, Georgia, Thailand, South Africa, Russia, Greece, China, Australia, the Philippines, Malaysia, Cambodia, Mexico and more). We routinely work with parents with multiple nationalities/connections and so work with lawyers throughout Europe and the rest of the world. We frequently work with ex-pat British clients living all over the world.

• Historically, a large number of intended parents going overseas for surrogacy were reluctant to apply for parental orders, although this has gradually changed over time (and many of the parents who did not were those going to India, which is no longer possible). We have also advised many parents who are not eligible to apply for parental orders, particularly single parents (historically), parents without a biological connection and parents who are not domiciled in the UK.

• We have worked with different-sex couples, male same-sex couples and single parents (of all genders, including transgender). We have only advised a couple of female same-sex couples considering surrogacy, and none we are aware who have pursued it.

Please provide the cost of any legal advice or representation below:

Although we are not individuals, we thought it may be helpful to set out NGA Law's fees for legal advice and representation in surrogacy cases. We currently charge the following fixed fees (unless the case is particularly unusual, in which case we charge on a time spent basis – this is rare). Our fixed fees are all broadly reflective of time spent (other than our initial advice fees where we consistently make a loss against hourly rates):

For legal advice

£300 plus VAT – legal advice telephone/ Skype meeting (up to 1 hour) + confirmation to clinic we have advised.

£650 plus VAT – full legal review (1-2 hour meeting plus detailed letter of advice). This can cover multiple surrogacy options, family law, immigration/nationality and other practical issues, for either domestic or international surrogacy (or both).

The overwhelming majority of our clients seek advice prior to conception, and sometimes as a first step prior to settling on a surrogacy route. We also advise clients during the pregnancy, but it is rare for us to give first advice following the birth.

For parental order – domestic surrogacy

£2,000 plus VAT – support package (we prepare the evidence bespoke ready to file, and provide detailed instructions and documentation to support clients to manage the process themselves).

£6,000 plus VAT – legal representation (we manage the entire process, including preparing the evidence and representing throughout the application; our cases are finalised in one hearing 4-6 months post birth).

These services are optional for the parents who want additional support/handholding, and the majority of our clients feel confident to self-represent without them.

For parental order – international surrogacy

£6,000 plus VAT – basic legal representation service (we deal with the initial steps of the application, surrogate consent, initial preparation of the evidence and court bundle and give instructions to parents on how to manage the 2 hearings themselves).

£20,000 plus VAT – premium legal representation service (we manage the whole process, including full preparation of all the evidence and case management to resolve the application in the High Court in one hearing 4-6 months post birth).

Most of our clients opt for one of these services, although we also have a good number who self-represent on the back of an initial legal review (and sometimes we provide time-spent advice behind the scenes to support them).

119 Consultation Question 111: We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

120 Consultation Question 112:

Please provide your views below:

In respect of medical screening and implications counselling:

Brilliant Beginnings carries out the following screening of surrogates prior to match.

We pay the third party costs of this (set out below) but absorb them within our overall fees charged to intended parents:

• GP letter for basic medical screening - £30 - £120 depending on surgery

• Psychological screening with a clinical psychologist - £600 plus any travel related costs for surrogate

• Implications counselling prior to match, just before giving birth and just after £60 per session. Where additional sessions are required, we often subsidise or this is agreed in advance with the intended parents

• DBS record checks for surrogate and anyone over 18 in her household – paid initially by surrogate and then reimbursed at match.

Full medical screening and implications counselling is then provided by the fertility clinic. These costs are charged by the clinic to intended parents.
In respect of legal costs:

Many fertility clinics already require the parties to have independent legal advice, and we provide a specific light-touch service for intended parents/surrogates to satisfy this requirement for which we charge £300 plus VAT. This covers a one-off meeting/call of up to an hour, and confirmation in writing to the clinic we have done so.

We also offer clients the option of more in-depth meeting (often in international surrogacy cases where we also cover immigration issues). We charge a fee of £650 plus VAT which covers a 2 hour meeting and a detailed letter confirming our advice in writing.

We obviously do not currently draft surrogacy agreements, but comparably in known donation cases we currently offer:

• a template agreement which can be purchased from us for £250 plus VAT without any legal advice, or

• a full-service package which costs £2,000 plus VAT and includes a legal review meeting (up to 2 hours), a letter of advice confirming our advice in writing, and a bespoke drafted pre-conception agreement. NB. In respect of the surrogacy pathway this would cover both independent legal advice and the agreement. We would expect to charge this as a baseline for surrogacy, if permitted to do so. We would later review our time costs and would charge more (or less) for the enhanced service if the fixed fee was not a sensible reflection of our time at our usual hourly rates.

122 Consultation Question 114:

Please provide your views below:

We do not think that anyone other than a regulated surrogacy organisation should be able to confirm that the pathway requirements have been met. Surrogacy organisations have unique skills and experience in surrogacy, and can be regulated appropriately by the licensing system to carry out their responsibilities to:

• ensure that other professionals have fulfilled their role (medical, legal, counselling),
• carry out criminal records checks and conduct a welfare of the child assessment,
• ensure that the agreement has been signed and completed properly, and
• provide information to the national surrogacy register.

To ensure quality and consistency, we do not think this role should be carried out by anyone without an HFEA surrogacy licence. Lawyers, medics etc could of course apply for this licence (provided they are either non-profit or are not providing introduction services).

123 Consultation Question 115:

Please provide your views below:

The biggest hurdle to accessibility to UK surrogacy is the imbalance between the numbers of intended parents and the numbers of surrogates, which creates a shortage of surrogates and uncertainty for parents about whether or when they will be able to find a surrogate in the UK. As highlighted by our research with Cambridge University the lack of UK surrogates is (together with a desire for legal certainty) one of the two main motivators driving intended parents overseas. We hope that the Law Commission's proposals will increase accessibility to UK surrogacy by encouraging more women in the UK to volunteer to become surrogates. We think the following proposals will impact positively on this:

• The new pathway to parenthood – this will give surrogates more security (they too worry about the risk of intended parents changing their minds as well as their legal responsibility for a child that is not theirs) but even more significantly we think it conveys to women that becoming a surrogate is a legitimate thing to do, because a woman's choice to be a surrogate is recognised and supported by the law.

• A more honest and liberal regime in respect of payments – while we do not think that money is a primary motivator for surrogates given the enormous commitment involved, we do think that more women will come forward as surrogates if they feel that they can be fairly and honestly compensated for their efforts. Dealing with the financial arrangements more transparently will, like the pathway, give confidence in the process.

• All the surrogates we work at Brilliant Beginnings have the unequivocal support of a partner, spouse or other family/friend at the centre of their support network. It is often these supporters who act as barriers seeing the vulnerabilities around legal parenthood and the lack of clarity around expenses and so are barriers to a surrogate moving forward. Understandably a surrogate will not want to derail a happy stable home life with her offer to become a surrogate and there can be no doubt that greater security will offer this to the surrogate's supporter and enable them to have the peace of mind necessary.

• Regulation of surrogacy agencies – we think the badge of regulation will give women confidence in the services provided by surrogacy organisations.

• Removing the ban on advertising – we think this will facilitate the promotion of safe regulated surrogacy organisation services.

The other major issue in respect of accessibility is cost. Surrogacy is already an expensive process, with a UK surrogacy journey typically ranging from £10,000 to £50,000 (including surrogate expenses, IVF costs where applicable, organisation fees where applicable, legal advice/representation, wills where applicable, life insurance, parental order court fee). However, surrogacy is also a delicate and emotional process with enormous potential consequences for a child if it is not managed safely, and there is justification for requiring certain safeguarding steps even if there are costs implications. Ultimately, in the absence of state funding, the issue is how far to offset cost with safety, and we think the Law Commission has struck the right balance. We do not think any of the proposals, individually or collectively, will increase costs by a significant amount. We also recognise that the recommendations reflect best practice already followed in the majority of UK surrogacy arrangements, and that surrogacy teams will always have the option of not following the pathway and instead applying for a parental order.

125 Consultation Question 117: We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Please provide your views below:

Brilliant Beginnings has helped one intended parent in Northern Ireland but from time to time receives enquiries from either surrogates or intended parents from Northern Ireland. The practical hurdle that these people face is finding the appropriate services to support their journey without coming to the mainland. That said, there is no reason to think that the pathway should not encompass any surrogacy journey in Northern Ireland and would anticipate that there are already independent relationships taking place.

Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

(1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason, these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

(2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

(1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and

(2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason, these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

(1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;

(2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or

(3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

(1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,

(2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and

(3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

1.12 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;

(2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and

(3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations, * including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

(1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;

(2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and

(3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. * https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

(1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;

(2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and

(3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

(1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;

(2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and

(3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore, a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

(1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and

(2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Paragraph 8.77

Consultation Question 17.

1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

(1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:

(a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and

(b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or

(2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

(1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;

(2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and

(3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and

(2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

(1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and

(2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:

(a) administrative, or

(b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and

(2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

(1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and

(2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

1.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

(1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and

(2) they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

1.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

(1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and

(2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify a measure that contravenes recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

1.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the 'intended parents should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women's reproductive capacities.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

1.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

(2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.140

Consultation Question 30.

1.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

1.35 We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

N/A

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

1.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

1.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

1.38 We provisionally propose that:

(1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

(2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

(3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

1.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

(1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;

(2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;

(3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;

(4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and

(5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

1.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving derive income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

1.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

1.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

1.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

1.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

1.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

1.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

1.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

1.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

1.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

1.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

1.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

1.55 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

1.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.57 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the register should be maintained by the Authority;

(2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:

(a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and

(b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and

(3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

1.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

1.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

(1) where his or her legal parents have consented;

(2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or

(3) in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

1.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

1.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

1.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

(1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or

(2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

1.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

1.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

1.67 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

(2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:

(a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or

(b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and

(3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

1.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

1.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

1.70 We invite consultees' views on whether:

(1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or

(2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

1.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

1.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

(1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but

(2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

1.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 12.64

Consultation Question 60.

1.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

1.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

1.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

(1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or

(2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.78 We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

1.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

1.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

(1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or

(2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

1.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

1.82 We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.83 We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood.

I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.84 We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

1.85 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

1.86 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

1.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

1.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

(1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and

(2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

1.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

1.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

(1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;

(2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and

(3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

1.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

1.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

1.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

(1) based on an allowance;

(2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or

(3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

1.96 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and

(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

1.97 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and

(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

1.98 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and

(2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.29

Consultation Question 76.

1.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

1.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

(1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or

(2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

1.101 We invite consultees to share their experiences:

(1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and

(2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

1.102 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

(1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;

(2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or

(3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother compensation.

1.103 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother compensation.

1.104 We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

(1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or

(2) left to the parties to negotiate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother compensation.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

1.105 We invite consultees views' as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

1.106 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

(1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and

(2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

1.107 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.108 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

(1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or

(2) a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.109 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

(1) no other payments;

(2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;

(3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy;

(4) lost earnings;

(5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or

(6) gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to make any type of fee or payment to the birth mother for her 'services'.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

1.110 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

1.111 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

(1) in the first trimester of pregnancy only;

(2) to any miscarriage or termination; or

(3) some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

1.112 We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Paragraph 15.74

Consultation Question 85.

1.113 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

1.114 We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

1.115 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

(1) for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and

(2) for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

1.116 We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.117 We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Paragraph 16.10

Consultation Question 90.

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

1.120 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

1.121 We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

1.122 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

1.123 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

1.124 We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

1.125 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or

(2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.126 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

1.127 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 16.76

Consultation Question 96.

1.128 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

1.129 We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

1.130 We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

1.131 We provisionally propose that:

1.132 the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but

1.133 before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

1.134 We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

1.135 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

(1) any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and

(2) if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

1.136 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

1.137 We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

1.138 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and

(2) if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

1.139 We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

1.140 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

1.141 We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

1.142 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself.

There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

1.143 We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

1.144 We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

1.145 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit.

There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Paragraph 17.80

Consultation Question 109.

1.146 We invite consultees who are intended parents, live in the UK, and have entered into a surrogacy arrangement that led to the birth of a child to tell us:

(1) when the child was born;

(2) whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;

(3) whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and

(4) whether they are a:

(a) opposite-sex couple;

(b) male same-sex couple;

(c) female same-sex couple;

(d) single woman; or

(e) single man.

N/A

Paragraph 18.2

Consultation Question 110.

1.147 We invite consultees who have experience of applying for a parental order in the UK to tell us:

(1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;

(2) whether they had legal advice before the making of the parental order;

(3) whether they were represented by a lawyer in court; and

(4) the cost of any legal advice or representation.

N/A

Paragraph 18.4

Consultation Question 111.

1.148 We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 18.6

Consultation Question 112.

1.149 We invite consultees to tell us what they have paid for, or to provide evidence about the cost of:

(1) medical screening; and

(2) implications counselling

(where possible separating out the cost of such screening, tests or implications counselling from any other costs involved with fertility treatment).

N/A

1.150 We invite legal consultees, who advise on surrogacy and parental order proceedings, to provide evidence of what they would charge:

(1) to provide advice sufficient to meet the proposed requirement for independent legal advice discussed in Chapter 13; and

(2) to draft, advise on and negotiate the written surrogacy agreement required for the new pathway.

N/A

Paragraph 18.8

Consultation Question 113.

1.151 We invite consultees to tell us of the impact of:

(1) the current requirement of a genetic link; and

(2) any removal of this requirement in cases of medical necessity:

(a) in the new pathway;

(b) in the parental order route for domestic surrogacy arrangements; or

(c) in both situations.

Paragraph 18.11

Consultation Question 114.

1.152 We invite consultees who consider that they might be able to fulfil the role of the independent professional discussed in Chapter 9 to tell us:

(1) their profession; and

(2) what they would charge to provide such a service.

N/A

Paragraph 18.13

Consultation Question 115.

1.153 We invite consultees who are intended parents to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

(1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and

(2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

1.154 We invite consultees who are surrogates to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

(1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and

(2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

Paragraph 18.15

Consultation Question 116.

1.155 We ask consultees who are intended parents to tell us:

(1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;

(2) what they spent, in total, on the surrogacy arrangement(s) that led to the birth of their child(ren), including the cost of fertility treatment, payments to the surrogate and payments to any surrogacy agency or organisation;

(3) how they raised the funds for the surrogacy arrangement(s);

(4) what they spent on any fertility treatment prior to entering into a surrogacy arrangement (where that treatment did not lead to the birth of a child); and

(5) how they raised the funds for the fertility treatment.

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

1.156 We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

1.157 We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Please explain why you wish the information that you will provide to us to be treated as confidential:

The Church of Scotland welcomes the opportunity to respond to the consultation on the law surrounding surrogacy in the UK.
Policy making in the Church of Scotland is governed by the General Assembly of the Church, which is the highest decision- making body within the church. While recognising that there is diversity of opinion on many matters within the membership of the church, decisions of the annual General Assembly determine official policy of the Church of Scotland. As such, this response is bound to reflect that policy.
This is a subject which requires great wisdom and compassion. Throughout human history, childlessness and the inability to carry children has been a devastating reality for many. However, in seeking to address this issue, the law must take care that it safeguards the needs of all involved- most especially, the mother and the child.
The topic of surrogacy is inevitably a controversial one, reflecting the fact that, at the heart of the matter is the creation of new human life, with the express intention, from the outset of the process, that the gestational mother will hand the child over to others, and she will play no further part in the parenting of the child whom she has gestated. While it is clear that the breaking of parental bonds is sometimes inevitable (through, for example, death), the deliberate, pre-planned fragmenting of parenting is at the centre of the surrogacy process. The physical, psychological and spiritual bonding between mother and child is therefore deliberately denied from the outset.
Surrogacy is, from the outset, about the detachment of children from their mother. The potential for emotional and psychological distress and harm, for both mother and child, is significant and should not be underestimated.
Surrogacy arrangements are almost always based on a financial exchange. This commodifies both the mother and the child, reducing them to objects, whose primary use (in surrogacy) is to satisfy the desires of other human beings.
There are many aspects of the proposals made in the consultation which we find troubling. Perhaps the most fundamental is the presumption, made explicitly in the consultation document, that "...we take as our starting point that surrogacy is an accepted form of building a family." However, as surrogacy is prohibited in many other countries, including France and Germany, this presumption of the acceptance of surrogacy is, to our mind, erroneous.
In addition, as the stated policy of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland on the issue of surrogacy is one of opposition, we find ourselves unable to agree with this presumption, and are thus at odds with many of the conclusions which are drawn from this presumption in the consultation paper and the subsequent proposals which stem from this.

Chapter 8: Legal Parenthood: Proposals for Reform - A New Pathway

14 Consultation Question 7:

No

Please provide your views below:

The Church of Scotland is opposed to surrogacy in principle
We are also concerned by the proposal that the surrogate mother would not automatically be, as is now the case, the legal mother at birth until she relinquishes her maternal rights. Instead, it is proposed that, from birth, legal parenthood of the child would belong to the intended parents. The proposed legislation would place the burden on the surrogate mother to object, with only a very short timeframe for an objection to be raised. This is unjust because the surrogate mother – as with any birth mother – regardless of her plans during the pregnancy, needs sufficient time after the birth (which may have been physically demanding or traumatic), to process her feelings towards the child she has been caring for in utero for many months, and to decide whether she does indeed want to relinquish the child. This processing may require more than a few days or weeks.
The presumption of parenthood should always rest with the biological mother, and the law should not place an obligation on her to object to 'acquisition' of legal parenthood by the intended parents. Rather, she should be allowed, by positive action, to relinquish her parental rights and responsibilities, as is possible under the current approach to legal parenthood in surrogacy. The law cannot assume that surrogate mothers are always fully aware of the legal processes involved, and should strive to protect all from potential exploitation.
The expectation of almost immediate detachment from the child which she has carried for 9 months is not a reasonable expectation and should not, in our opinion, be legally endorsed. The surrogate mother is already in a weakened legal position with respect to the commissioning parents. This means that the surrogate mother will not always be able to ensure that she is fully respected and protected under the proposed new pathway. The new pathway proposed in the consultation does not give the same rights as previously for the surrogate to change her mind- especially if the child has already been physically taken away from her by the commissioning parents. The multitude of emotions around giving birth to a child should not be underestimated, nor should the amount of time that the surrogate may need to deal with these emotions and to decide if she would like to keep the child.

A consequence of the introduction of financial inducements to surrogacy will inevitably be, in our view, the potential exploitation of women who are socio- economically vulnerable. It is important that pregnancy should not be seen as "just another job" or as a means to financial gain. The draft proposals, if implemented, would have the effect of normalising commercial surrogacy, including advertising for and inducing women to sell their bodies and reproductive capacity.
With the proposed acceptance of commercial surrogacy there is also a risk of 'objectification'- that is, the treatment of a human being as a thing or an object, disregarding his or her personality and inherent dignity. This risk of objectification applies both to the mother and the child. It is because of such risks that Article 3 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights states that: "In the fields of medicine and biology, the following must be respected in particular … the prohibition on making the human body and its parts as such a source of financial gain". Similarly, the Council of Europe Convention on Human Rights and Biomedicine states in Article 21 that: "The human body and its parts shall not, as such, give rise to financial gain." Where surrogacy is a commercial agreement, the dignity of the child who is born as a result is violated through being, in effect, an object of barter.

We are also very concerned about the proposed advocacy of international surrogacy arrangements. It should be noted that a number of jurisdictions which have previously served as 'hubs' for surrogacy tourism (for example Thailand and Cambodia) have recently rejected this practice due to concerns over the exploitation of women and have now regulated or are in the process of regulating surrogacy. Perhaps most notably, the Indian parliament has passed a bill which forbids commercial surrogacy and prevents any foreign nationals from using an Indian woman as a surrogate. It is instructive that a country which has experienced first- hand the devastating effects of commercial surrogacy has now introduced legislation to end it, in order to protect women from exploitation

There are clearly implications for the proposed changes in relation to international treaties such as CEDAW (Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women) and UNCRC (UN Convention on the Rights of the Child) which we feel are not adequately addressed in the consultation. In addition, as the CRC will be incorporated into Scots law, we are concerned as to how these changes will reflect this.

It should also be noted that, based on available evidence, it appears that there is a difference between the level of demand' for surrogacy services in Scotland and in England and Wales. The demand for such services in England is significantly higher than that in Scotland, possibly justifying the need for a separate legal approach to surrogacy in Scotland. The consultation paper fails to consider the possibility of Scotland adopting its own regulation of surrogacy.

Please provide your views below:

Pregnancy and childbirth are dangerous and traumatic. The consultation is very light on who has control of the woman's body and decisions during pregnancy- from things as simple as food or drink choices, to more complicated decisions around who gets to make choices around medicinal drugs or treatment including chemotherapy during the pregnancy. If the intended parents can enforce lack of treatment, forced pregnancy or forced abortion on women, this is a catastrophic violation of human rights. In addition, we have concerns around who takes care of the short- and long- term health needs of surrogate women once they have given birth.
While some women will be motivated to become surrogates for compassionate or altruistic reasons, the risks of commodification and objectification are very real when it is likely that, in many cases, it will be women most needing money who will become surrogates. Society would then be faced with the unacceptable situation where the long term use of human bodies, as such, could have a price.
It could also be argued that the inherent human dignity of a woman is diminished when she is induced to use her uterus for financial profit and is considered as little more than an incubator for somebody else's child. Moreover, since there are real medical and psychological risks inherent in gestating and giving birth to a child, no woman should ever be induced to undertake a pregnancy for another woman motivated by the exchange of money.
However, even when there is no commercial transaction in the surrogacy arrangement, there is still a risk of the woman just being considered as a kind of 'container' or 'incubator' divorced of any natural maternal relationships with her child. This situation is further complicated when double donation is involved, as the surrogate mother then has no genetic link with the child whom she is carrying.
During pregnancy a woman has already been investing in genuine maternal care, and therefore has rights and responsibilities as a birth mother which the law should reflect. Surrogacy objectifies this process and the human beings involved. Despite occasional reference to the best interests of the child who is born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement, we see little evidence of this concern for the child who will be brought into existence as a result of the surrogacy process. We are concerned that the consultation document is very much centred on the wishes of adults involved and, in particular, of the intended parents.

The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland has expressed opposition in principle to surrogacy. While we accept that there may be some merit in revising the current legal framework around surrogacy in the UK, we dispute many of the underlying assumptions in the consultation document and would wish to register our disquiet about many aspects of the changes which are proposed by this consultation. We are particularly concerned about the potential for exploitation of women which will result from the introduction of commercial surrogacy in the UK. Any future work on this topic should consult with women's and children's organisations as a matter of urgency and a human rights based approach to surrogacy should be embedded in all future work.

Consultation Question 1.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

1. all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

2. if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

(1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and

(2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

3. there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;
4. it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or
5. further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

6. entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,
7. complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and
8. met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the childs birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

We provisionally propose that:

9. the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;
10. this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and
11. the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

12. the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;
13. if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and
14. the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

15. the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;
16. if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and
17. if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

(1.15.1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;

(1.15.2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and

(1.15.3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.1 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child. Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

18. the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and
19. the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Paragraph 8.77

Consultation Question 17.

We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

20. it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:
    1. for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and
    2. for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or
21. the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

22. the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;
23. if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and
24. if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

We invite consultees' views as to:

25. a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and
26. how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

We invite consultees' views:

27. as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and
28. if so, as to whether should this oversight be:
    1. administrative, or
    2. judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

29. whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and
30. if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

31. as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and
32. what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

33. the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and
34. they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

35. the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and
36. if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the 'intended parents' should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women's reproductive capacities.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to:

37. whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and
38. whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.140

Consultation Question 30.

We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

N/A

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

We provisionally propose that:

39. there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

40. there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

41. each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

42. representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;
43. managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;
44. ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;
45. training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and
46. providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

We provisionally propose that:

47. the register should be maintained by the Authority;
48. the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:
    1. identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and
    2. non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and
49. to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

50. where his or her legal parents have consented;
51. if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or
52. in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

53. if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or
54. if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

We provisionally propose that:

55. the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

56. the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:
    1. where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or
    2. following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and
57. the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

We invite consultees' views on whether:

58. the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or
59. the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

60. should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but
61. that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 12.64

Consultation Question 60.

We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

62. for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or
63. for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

64. those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or
65. if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

66. the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and
67. the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

(1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;

(2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and

(3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

68. based on an allowance;
69. based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or
70. based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

We invite consultees' views as to:

71. whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and
72. the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

We invite consultees' views as to:

73. whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and
74. the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

We invite consultees' views as to:

75. whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and
76. the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.29

Consultation Question 76.

We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

77. her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or
78. other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

We invite consultees to share their experiences:

79. of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and
80. where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

81. pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;
82. medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or
83. specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

It is absurd to propose that one could place a monetary value on the pain of adverse pregnancy outcomes. In putting a price tag on perineal tear for example, some mothers report little pain or symptoms, others have profound ongoing fear of vaginal penetration, which can result in very significant emotional and relationship difficulties. Infection may complicate healing, and some women report long term sequelae from this, such as impaired wound healing.

Haematology conditions should also be considered. Blood loss, for example due to placental haemorrhage can be very significant, and potentially result in emergency hysterectomy and blood transfusion to save the life of the mother. It is a fact that although blood is thoroughly screened in the UK there still remains the potential for blood borne illnesses to be transmitted, and the fact that some of these may not have been identified yet by researchers is also a real risk to a mother receiving transfusion. Persons who have had a blood transfusion are currently unable to donate blood themselves in the UK, due to the risk of (vCJD) transmission. This is an indication of the gravity of receiving blood products.

No medical intervention is EVER risk free. Receiving multiple blood products in the context of Massive Transfusion Protocol (eg platelets, Fresh Frozen Plasma, cryoprecipitate) only heighten those risks.

Conditions such as HELLP (Haemolysis, Elevated Liver enzymes, Low Platelets) can be fatal, and although the maternal mortality rate is low, it can have significant sequelae, including renal failure potentially requiring dialysis, placental abruption (potentially fatal for mother and baby) permanent liver damage and retinal detachment resulting in visual impairment.

Each of these conditions have long term consequences for a woman, psychologically, physically and emotionally, and may also affect her ability to return to work or care for other children.

Also, the late complications of childbirth have been disregarded. Late consequences of childbirth can include vaginal or rectal prolapse, urinary and faecal incontinence. Women who have had a C section may experience ongoing pain around the scar. Some sources quote this as affecting between 6 and 18 percent of women. These symptoms can be profoundly distressing, and may take years to present (conversely, may present immediately).

How could we ensure that women suffering these complications are compensated? They are multifactorial, and risk increases with instrumented delivery and parity. How would it be proposed to unpick the role of a surrogate pregnancy in causing these symptoms in relation to other risk factors, for example parity, smoking history, personal medical history?

Psychiatric conditions are also absent from this list. Complications including depression and anxiety may be worsened by pregnancy. Other mental health conditions such as post natal depression and post partum psychosis can be fatal, and impact on a woman's health for many years to come. I'm quite shocked that none of these conditions have been explicitly mentioned and it does make me wonder how the list of complications was created. I'd also like to know what level of haemorrhage would be considered "excessive".

The wording of the question "should" be able to pay compensation is not the same as being mandated to do so. This potentially creates a situation where some "luckier" women would receive compensation others would not.

All of the above illustrates the risks of surrogacy and confirms my support for a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

84. a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or
85. left to the parties to negotiate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

We invite consultees views' as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

We invite consultees' views as to whether:

86. intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and
87. if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

88. any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or
89. a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

90. no other payments;
91. essential costs relating to the pregnancy;
92. additional costs relating to the pregnancy;
93. lost earnings;

94. compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or
95. gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

96. in the first trimester of pregnancy only;

97. to any miscarriage or termination; or
98. some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Paragraph 15.74

Consultation Question 85.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

99. for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and
100. for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Paragraph 15.99

Consultation Question 89.

We invite overseas surrogates (or bodies representing or advocating for surrogates) to share with us their experiences f international surrogacy arrangements.

N/A

Paragraph 16.10

Consultation Question 90.

We invite organisations focused on children's rights and welfare in the international context to share with us their views on our proposed reforms and consultation questions in this chapter.

N/A

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

We provisionally propose that:

(1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or

(2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 16.76

Consultation Question 96.

We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

We provisionally propose that:
the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the childs birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

We invite consultees' views as to whether:

101. any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

We invite consultees' views as to:

103. whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and

104. if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself. There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

At a time when the NHS is under severe strain, and life changing therapies (for cancer, cystic fibrosis etc) are not funded due to financial constraints it is a slap in the face to provide money for prospective parents to indulge their parenting fantasies while denying patients access to drugs which are standard of care in other counties.

We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Paragraph 17.80

Consultation Question 109.

We invite consultees who are intended parents, live in the UK, and have entered into a surrogacy arrangement that led to the birth of a child to tell us:

105. when the child was born;
106. whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;
107. whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and
108. whether they are a:
    1. opposite-sex couple;
    2. male same-sex couple;
    3. female same-sex couple;
    4. single woman; or
    5. single man.

N/A

Paragraph 18.2

Consultation Question 110.

We invite consultees who have experience of applying for a parental order in the UK to tell us:

109. whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
110. whether they had legal advice before the making of the parental order;
111. whether they were represented by a lawyer in court; and
112. the cost of any legal advice or representation.

N/A

Paragraph 18.4

Consultation Question 111.

We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 18.6

Consultation Question 112.

We invite consultees to tell us what they have paid for, or to provide evidence about the cost of:

113. medical screening; and
114. implications counselling

(where possible separating out the cost of such screening, tests or implications counselling from any other costs involved with fertility treatment).

N/A

We invite legal consultees, who advise on surrogacy and parental order proceedings, to provide evidence of what they would charge:

115. to provide advice sufficient to meet the proposed requirement for independent legal advice discussed in Chapter 13; and
116. to draft, advise on and negotiate the written surrogacy agreement required for the new pathway.

N/A

Paragraph 18.8

Consultation Question 113.

We invite consultees to tell us of the impact of:

117. the current requirement of a genetic link; and
118. any removal of this requirement in cases of medical necessity:
    1. in the new pathway;
    2. in the parental order route for domestic surrogacy arrangements; or
    3. in both situations.

Paragraph 18.11

Consultation Question 114.

We invite consultees who consider that they might be able to fulfil the role of the independent professional discussed in Chapter 9 to tell us:

119. their profession; and
120. what they would charge to provide such a service.

N/A

Paragraph 18.13

Consultation Question 115.

We invite consultees who are intended parents to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

121. if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and
122. if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

We invite consultees who are surrogates to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

123. if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and
124. if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

Paragraph 18.15

Consultation Question 116.

We ask consultees who are intended parents to tell us:

125. whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
126. what they spent, in total, on the surrogacy arrangement(s) that led to the birth of their child(ren), including the cost of fertility treatment, payments to the surrogate and payments to any surrogacy agency or organisation;
127. how they raised the funds for the surrogacy arrangement(s);
128. what they spent on any fertility treatment prior to entering into a surrogacy arrangement (where that treatment did not lead to the birth of a child); and
129. how they raised the funds for the fertility treatment.

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

It seems entirely at odds with proper and planned surrogacy that the surrogate carries an on going responsibility. This does not seem fair when they have chosen not to be a parent. Similarly it is problematic for IP's to have all responsibility for the life and welfare in practice and not in law

12 Consultation Question 5: We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the Family Procedure Rules 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. 24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.Do consultees agree?

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

Please provide your views below:

That seems like an appropriate safeguard. However if they already signed to say they wanted the child to go to the IP's this must at maximum be light touch and is potentially over the top in terrible circumstances

Please provide your views below:

The child should still be registered as the intended parents. Surrogates do not become surrogates to have a child. If they did they would have their own child. They should not be forced to bear the responsibility of the child they were carrying for someone else

In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

Please provide your views below:

We are IP's and my sister in law is our surrogate. We had counselling individually and as a group through our clinic before testing took place. It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

Short Form Questionnaire: Law Commissions' Surrogacy Consultation

This form is an extract of the longer form for comments and responses to the Law Commission's and the Scottish Law Commission's consultation about reforming surrogacy law. If you would like to respond to the full version of our consultation questionnaire, please use the online form: https://consult.justice.gov.uk/law-commission/surrogacy. Please see our websites for further details, and for links to download the full consultation paper: https://www.lawcom.gov.uk/project/surrogacy/ and https://www.scotlawcom.gov.uk/law-reform/law-reform-projects/joint-projects/surrogacy/.

We have selected 46 questions which may be of particular interest of those with lived experience of surrogacy arrangements: surrogates, intended parents, family members and adult children born of surrogacy arrangements. You do not need to answer all the questions if you do not want to, and you can write as much or as little as you would like in response to our questions.

Please note that we may publish or disclose information you provide us in response to this consultation, including personal information. We ask consultees, when providing their responses, if they could avoid including personal identifying information in the text of their response, particularly where this may reveal the identities of other people involved in their surrogacy arrangement.

For more information about how we consult and how we may use responses to the consultation, please see page i – ii of the Consultation Paper.

Question No.	Consultation Question
Q1	Consultation Question 7. In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have: (1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth, (2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and (3) met eligibility requirements, on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q1	Yes. Intended parents should automatically be legal parents at birth. This is in the best interests of everyone, especially the child. It also helps in situations where the baby needs consent for hospital treatment.
Q2	Consultation Question 11. We provisionally propose that:

	(1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child; (2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and (3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q2	No – the surrogate should not have the right to object after birth. Intended parents should become legal parents at the moment of birth.
Q3	Consultation Question 12. We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that: (1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child; (2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and (3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q3	I do not think that at any point the surrogate should automatically become the legal parent of the baby, this is not what surrogates want. In the event of a dispute the IPs should remain legal parents until the case goes to court.
Q4	Consultation Question 15. We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.
Your Response to Q4	I don't think the spouse or civil partner should have legal parenthood under any circumstances. It is not something they want!
Q5	Consultation Question 27.

	We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway: (1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and (2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q5	I think intended parents should have parental responsibility at the birth of the child. They should also have automatic parental responsibility in the event of a dispute, until a court makes a decison in the best interests of the child.
Q6	Consultation Question 28. We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q6	No. Intended parents want to be recognised as legal parents at birth. The surrogates I know (including our surrogate) do not want to have legal responsibility of a child from birth that they have carried for others (and therefore do not see the baby as their own).
Q7	Consultation Question 29. For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and (2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.
Your Response to Q7	As above. I do not think the surrogate should have automatic legal responsibility for a child she has carried for others.
Q8	Consultation Question 55. We provisionally propose that: (1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available; (2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:

	(a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or (b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and (3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q8	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q9	Consultation Question 30. We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q9	Yes. The pathway should be the same regardless of genetics.
Q10	Consultation Question 32. We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway. We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.
Your Response to Q10	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q11	Consultation Question 67. We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway: (1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and (2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15. Do consultees agree?

Your Response to Q11	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q12	Consultation Question 68. We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q12	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q13	Consultation Question 88. We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q13	The financial terms of a surrogacy agreement should be enforceable by the surrogate. It should not be dependent on her lifestyle.
Q14	Consultation Question 42. We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q14	Yes, I agree an advertising ban should be lifted. Couples can currently advertise for egg/sperm donors.
Q15	Consultation Question 62. We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity: (1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or (2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made. We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

Your Response to Q15	I think surrogacy should be broadly medically necessary. If a doctor thinks surrogacy is necessary then that should satisfy the requirement. I include in "medically necessary" situations such as an extreme fear of pregnancy or those who would have to stop life saving/changing medicine if they were to get pregnant. I think same-sex couples and transgender people should be able to access surrogacy.
Q16	Consultation Question 70. We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.
Your Response to Q16	No, I don't think this should be a requirement. I know several surrogates who are childless by choice. They fully understood the implications/risks before embarking on surrogacy and all their journeys have gone well. Most have had more than one surrogacy journey. I respect surrogates' autonomy to choose.
Q17	Consultation Question 33. We provisionally propose that: (1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations; (2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and (3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q17	I think there should be some regulation of surrogacy organisations.
Q18	Consultation Question 35. We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q18	Yes
Q19	Consultation Question 37. We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

Your Response to Q19	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q20	Consultation Question 59. We provisionally propose that the new pathway – (1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but (2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements. We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q20	I agree that double donation should be allowed where it is a medical necessity
Q21	Consultation Question 46. We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q21	Yes
Q22	Consultation Question 47. We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that: (1) the register should be maintained by the Authority; (2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include: (a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and (b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and (3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies. Do consultees agree?

Your Response to Q22	Yes
Q23	Consultation Question 48. We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.
Your Response to Q23	Yes
Q24	Consultation Question 49. We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances: (1) where his or her legal parents have consented; (2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or (3) in any other circumstances.
Your Response to Q24	Yes I agree those born through surrogacy should be able to access the register. In practice, most parents are honest with their children and children born through surrogacy will be aware of the facts surrounding their birth from an early age.
Q25	Consultation Question 51.

	We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.
Your Response to Q25	Yes – genetic siblings should be able to identify each other. I'm not sure about whether there should be a requirement if they are not genetically related.
Q26	Consultation Question 52. We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so: (1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or (2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.
Your Response to Q26	If they are genetically related they should be able to identify each other. I'm not sure if it should be mandatory if they are not genetically related. However, my children do know the other child our surrogate carried – we are all friends and holiday together every year!
Q27	Consultation Question 53. For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.
Your Response to Q27	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q28	Consultation Question 72. We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be: (1) based on an allowance; (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.
Your Response to Q28	2. Costs actually incurred by the surrogate. Most surrogates keep good records of expenses but I'm concerned about having to have formal receipts for everything.

Q29	Consultation Question 73. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".
Your Response to Q29	Anything related to carrying a surrogate pregnancy should be included eg. vitamins, maternity wear, childcare, loss of earnings, taxis, healthy and quick meals for the family, family bonding holiday after birth etc. I do not support a move to a commercial model so do not support inconvenience payments or set amounts for reaching a certain stage in pregnancy etc. Or a payment for carrying a baby. Surrogates I know do not support commercialisation which will benefit lawyers etc rather than themselves. Moreover, they do not want the stigma associated with being a "womb for rent". They carry a baby for altruistic reasons – no amount of money can compensate them for the sacrifices they make. Commercialisation may attract women to become surrogates for the wrong reasons. It will also price people out of becoming parents (as happens in the US). Women such as myself who may already be at a disadvantage financially due to illness (cancer etc) may not be able to access this form of family building.
Q30	Consultation Question 74. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.
Your Response to Q30	See first two paragraphs Q 29.
Q31	Consultation Question 75. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and (2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.
Your Response to Q31	See first two paragraphs Q29
Q32	Consultation Question 76.

	We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).
Your Response to Q32	Yes, absolutely!
Q33	Consultation Question 77. We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings: (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).
Your Response to Q33	Yes
Q34	Consultation Question 78. We invite consultees to share their experiences: (1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and (2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.
Your Response to Q34	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q35	Consultation Question 79. We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following: (1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth; (2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or (3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

	We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation. We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be: (1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or (2) left to the parties to negotiate.
Your Response to Q35	No compensation for the pain and inconvenience per se. However, I would class counselling, medical treatments etc arising from these things to be important. Plus things already including in expenses eg. loss of earnings and childcare costs for a transfer day to be covered. I do not want to see a fixed fee as all surrogates have unique circumstances. It should be left to the parties to negotiate.
Q36	Consultation Question 80. We invite consultees views' as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.
Your Response to Q36	Life insurance should be paid by the intended parents BEFORE starting treatment to cover this.
Q37	Consultation Question 81. We invite consultees' views as to whether: (1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and (2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.
Your Response to Q37	I think intended parents should be free to choose gifts they see fit. It is not expected but very much appreciated.
Q38	Consultation Question 82. We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be: (1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or (2) a fixed fee set by the regulator. We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

	(1) no other payments; (2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy; (3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy; (4) lost earnings; (5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or (6) gifts.
Your Response to Q38	I do not want to see a fixed fee or any sum paid to surrogates above expenses (see Q29). I am against a move to commercialisation of surrogacy. This is not what surrogates or intended want. It would fundamentally change the nature of the surrogacy relationship. Surrogacy is not a business arrangement.
Q39	Consultation Question 84. We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q39	Should be the same whatever is decided.
Q40	Consultation Question 85. We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.
Your Response to Q40	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q41	Consultation Question 92. We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q41	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q42	Consultation Question 94. We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that: (1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or (2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

Q43	Consultation Question 95. We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q43	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q44	Consultation Question 97. We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q44	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q45	Consultation Question 99.

	We provisionally propose that: the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q45	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q46	Consultation Question 107. We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area. We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales. We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

No

Please provide your views below:

This challenges the definition of a mother (ie having given birth to a child) this could cause some difficulty for the registration officer having to question the parents and then to determine whether they can legal register the birth - presumably there would be a requirement for a change in legislation? What evidence would the intended parents have?

Would there be a national register? where would this be kept?

Short Form Questionnaire: Law Commissions' Surrogacy Consultation

This form is an extract of the longer form for comments and responses to the Law Commission's and the Scottish Law Commission's consultation about reforming surrogacy law. If you would like to respond to the full version of our consultation questionnaire, please use the online form: https://consult.justice.gov.uk/law-commission/surrogacy. Please see our websites for further details, and for links to download the full consultation paper: https://www.lawcom.gov.uk/project/surrogacy/ and https://www.scotlawcom.gov.uk/law-reform/law-reform-projects/joint-projects/surrogacy/.

We have selected 46 questions which may be of particular interest of those with lived experience of surrogacy arrangements: surrogates, intended parents, family members and adult children born of surrogacy arrangements. You do not need to answer all the questions if you do not want to, and you can write as much or as little as you would like in response to our questions.

Please note that we may publish or disclose information you provide us in response to this consultation, including personal information. We ask consultees, when providing their responses, if they could avoid including personal identifying information in the text of their response, particularly where this may reveal the identities of other people involved in their surrogacy arrangement.

For more information about how we consult and how we may use responses to the consultation, please see page i – ii of the Consultation Paper.

Question No.	Consultation Question
Q1	Consultation Question 7. In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have: (1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth, (2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and (3) met eligibility requirements, on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q1	Parents should be legal parents at birth. Surrogates do not want to be legally responsible for a baby that is not theirs.
Q2	Consultation Question 11. We provisionally propose that:

	(1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child; (2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and (3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q2	I think the intended parents should have legal parenthood under any circumstances because they will be looking after the child. If the surrogate disagrees parenthood should be decided by the court in the best interests of the child.
Q3	Consultation Question 12. We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that: (1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child; (2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and (3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q3	I disagree. Even if a surrogate does not want the intended parents to have parenthood they may not want to be legally responsible for the child.
Q4	Consultation Question 15. We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.
Your Response to Q4	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q5	Consultation Question 27.

	We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway: (1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and (2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q5	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q6	Consultation Question 28. We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q6	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q7	Consultation Question 29. For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and (2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.
Your Response to Q7	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q8	Consultation Question 55. We provisionally propose that: (1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available; (2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:

	(a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or (b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and (3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q8	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q9	Consultation Question 30. We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q9	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q10	Consultation Question 32. We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway. We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.
Your Response to Q10	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q11	Consultation Question 67. We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway: (1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and (2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15. Do consultees agree?

Your Response to Q11	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q12	Consultation Question 68. We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q12	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q13	Consultation Question 88. We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q13	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q14	Consultation Question 42. We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q14	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q15	Consultation Question 62. We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity: (1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or (2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made. We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

Your Response to Q15	Medical necessity or for gay/transgender couples/people
Q16	Consultation Question 70. We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.
Your Response to Q16	No. It is up to the surrogate to decide on the level of risk she is willing to take. I know several childless surrogates who enjoy being pregnant and creating families but do not want to be parents themselves.
Q17	Consultation Question 33. We provisionally propose that: (1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations; (2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and (3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q17	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q18	Consultation Question 35. We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q18	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q19	Consultation Question 37. We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.
Your Response to Q19	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q20	Consultation Question 59.

	We provisionally propose that the new pathway – (1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but (2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements. We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q20	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q21	Consultation Question 46. We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q21	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q22	Consultation Question 47. We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that: (1) the register should be maintained by the Authority; (2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include: (a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and

	(b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and (3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q22	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q23	Consultation Question 48. We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.
Your Response to Q23	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q24	Consultation Question 49. We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances: (1) where his or her legal parents have consented; (2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or (3) in any other circumstances.
Your Response to Q24	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q25	Consultation Question 51. We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so. Do consultees agree?

	We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.
Your Response to Q25	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q26	Consultation Question 52. We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so: (1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or (2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.
Your Response to Q26	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q27	Consultation Question 53. For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.
Your Response to Q27	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q28	Consultation Question 72. We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be: (1) based on an allowance; (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.
Your Response to Q28	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q29	Consultation Question 73. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and

	(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".
Your Response to Q29	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q30	Consultation Question 74. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.
Your Response to Q30	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q31	Consultation Question 75. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and (2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.
Your Response to Q31	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q32	Consultation Question 76. We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).
Your Response to Q32	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q33	Consultation Question 77. We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings: (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).
Your Response to Q33	Click or tap here to enter text.

Q34	Consultation Question 78. We invite consultees to share their experiences: (1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and (2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.
Your Response to Q34	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q35	Consultation Question 79. We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following: (1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth; (2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or (3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy. We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation. We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be: (1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or (2) left to the parties to negotiate.
Your Response to Q35	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q36	Consultation Question 80. We invite consultees views' as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.
Your Response to Q36	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q37	Consultation Question 81.

	We invite consultees' views as to whether: (1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and (2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.
Your Response to Q37	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q38	Consultation Question 82. We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be: (1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or (2) a fixed fee set by the regulator. We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee: (1) no other payments; (2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy; (3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy; (4) lost earnings; (5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or (6) gifts.
Your Response to Q38	No. I do not want to see a move towards commercial surrogacy. And our surrogate does not want this either – she did it to help my partner and I become parents after my parners had had cancer treatment.
Q39	Consultation Question 84. We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q39	Click or tap here to enter text.

Q40	Consultation Question 85. We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.
Your Response to Q40	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q41	Consultation Question 92. We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q41	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q42	Consultation Question 94. We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that: (1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or (2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.
Your Response to Q42	Click or tap here to enter text.

Q43	Consultation Question 95. We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q43	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q44	Consultation Question 97. We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q44	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q45	Consultation Question 99. We provisionally propose that: the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q45	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q46	Consultation Question 107. We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area. We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

	We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

(1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

(2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

(1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and

(2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

s://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

(1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;

(2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or

(3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

(1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,

(2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and

(3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

1.12 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;

(2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and

(3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

(1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;

(2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and

(3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. * https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

(1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;

(2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and

(3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

(1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;

(2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and

(3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

onsultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

(1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and

(2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Paragraph 8.77

Consultation Question 17.

1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

(1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:
   (a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and
   (b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or

(2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

(1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;

(2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and

(3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and

(2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

(1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and

(2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:

(a) administrative, or

(b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and

(2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

(1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and

(2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

1.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

(1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and

(2) they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

1.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

(1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and

(2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify a measure that contravenes recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

1.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the 'intended parents' should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women's reproductive capacities.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

1.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

(2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.140

Consultation Question 30.

1.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

1.35 We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

N/A

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

1.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

1.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

1.38 We provisionally propose that:

(1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

(2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

(3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

1.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

(1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;
(2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;
(3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;
(4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and
(5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

1.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

1.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

1.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

1.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

1.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

1.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

1.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

1.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

1.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

1.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

1.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

1.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

1.55 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

1.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.57 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the register should be maintained by the Authority;

(2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:

(a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and

(b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and

(3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

1.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

1.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

(1) where his or her legal parents have consented;
(2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or
(3) in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

1.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

1.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

1.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

(1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or

(2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

1.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

1.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

1.67 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

(2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:

(a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or

(b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and

(3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

1.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

1.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

1.70 We invite consultees' views on whether:

(1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or

(2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

1.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

1.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

(1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but

(2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

1.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 12.64

Consultation Question 60.

1.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

1.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

1.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

(1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or

(2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.78 We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

1.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

1.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

(1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or

(2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

1.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

1.82 We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.83 We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.84 We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

1.85 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

1.86 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for a 'new pathway'. At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

1.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

1.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

(1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and

(2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

1.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

1.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:
(1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;
(2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and
(3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

1.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

1.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

1.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

(1) based on an allowance;

(2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or

(3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

1.96 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and

(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

1.97 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and

(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

1.98 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and

(2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.29

Consultation Question 76.

1.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

1.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

(1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or

(2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

1.101 We invite consultees to share their experiences:

(1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and

(2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

1.102 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

(1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;
(2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or
(3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

It is absurd to propose that one could place a monetary value on the pain of adverse pregnancy outcomes. In putting a price tag on perineal tear for example, some mothers report little pain or symptoms, others have profound ongoing fear of vaginal penetration, which can result in very significant emotional and relationship difficulties. Infection may complicate healing, and some women report long term sequelae from this, such as impaired wound healing.

Haematology conditions should also be considered. Blood loss, for example due to placental haemorrhage can be very significant, and potentially result in emergency hysterectomy and blood transfusion to save the life of the mother. It is a fact that although blood is thoroughly screened in the UK there still remains the potential for blood borne illnesses to be transmitted, and the fact that some of these may not have been identified yet by researchers is also a real risk to a mother receiving transfusion. Persons who have had a blood transfusion are currently unable to donate blood themselves in the UK, due to the risk of (vCJD) transmission. This is an indication of the gravity of receiving blood products.

No medical intervention is EVER risk free. Receiving multiple blood products in the context of Massive Transfusion Protocol (eg platelets, Fresh Frozen Plasma, cryoprecipitate) only heighten those risks.

Conditions such as HELLP (Haemolysis, Elevated Liver enzymes, Low Platelets) can be fatal, and although the maternal mortality rate is low, it can have significant sequelae, including renal failure potentially requiring dialysis, placental abruption (potentially fatal for mother and baby) permanent liver damage and retinal detachment resulting in visual impairment.

Each of these conditions have long term consequences for a woman, psychologically, physically and emotionally, and may also affect her ability to return to work or care for other children.

Also, the late complications of childbirth have been disregarded. Late consequences of childbirth can include vaginal or rectal prolapse, urinary and faecal incontinence. Women who have had a C section may experience ongoing pain around the scar. Some sources quote this as affecting between 6 and 18 percent of women. These symptoms can be profoundly distressing, and may take years to present (conversely, may present immediately).

How could we ensure that women suffering these complications are compensated? They are multifactorial, and risk increases with instrumented delivery and parity. How would it be proposed to unpick the role of a surrogate pregnancy in causing these symptoms in relation to other risk factors, for example parity, smoking history, personal medical history?

Psychiatric conditions are also absent from this list. Complications including depression and anxiety may be worsened by pregnancy. Other mental health conditions such as post natal depression and post partum psychosis can be fatal, and impact on a woman's health for many years to come. I'm quite shocked that none of these conditions have been explicitly mentioned and it does make me wonder how the list of complications was created. I'd also like to know what level of haemorrhage would be considered "excessive".

The wording of the question "should" be able to pay compensation is not the same as being mandated to do so. This potentially creates a situation where some "luckier" women would receive compensation others would not.

All of the above illustrates the risks of surrogacy and confirms my support for a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.103 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.104 We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:
(1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or
(2) left to the parties to negotiate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

1.105 We invite consultees views' as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

1.106 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

(1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and

(2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

1.107 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.108 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

(1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or
(2) a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.109 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

(1) no other payments;
(2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;
(3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy;
(4) lost earnings;
(5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or
(6) gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to make any type of fee or payment to the birth mother for her 'services'.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

1.110 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

1.111 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

(1) in the first trimester of pregnancy only;
(2) to any miscarriage or termination; or
(3) some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

1.112 We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Paragraph 15.74

Consultation Question 85.

1.113 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

1.114 We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

1.115 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

(1) for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and
(2) for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

1.116 We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.117 We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

1.120 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

1.121 We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

1.122 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

1.123 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

1.124 We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

1.125 We provisionally propose that:
(1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or
(2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.126 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

1.127 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

1.129 We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

1.130 We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Consultation Question 99.

1.131 We provisionally propose that:

1.132 the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but

1.133 before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

1.134 We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

1.135 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

(1) any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and

(2) if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

1.136 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

1.137 We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

1.138 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and

(2) if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

1.139 We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

1.140 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

1.141 We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

1.142 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself. There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

At a time when the NHS is under severe strain, and life changing therapies (for cancer, cystic fibrosis etc) are not funded due to financial constraints it is a slap in the face to provide money for prospective parents to indulge their parenting fantasies while denying patients access to drugs which are standard of care in other counties.

1.143 We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

1.144 We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

1.145 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Paragraph 17.80

Consultation Question 109.

1.146 We invite consultees who are intended parents, live in the UK, and have entered into a surrogacy arrangement that led to the birth of a child to tell us:

(1) when the child was born;
(2) whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;
(3) whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and
(4) whether they are a:
  (a) opposite-sex couple;
  (b) male same-sex couple;
  (c) female same-sex couple;
  (d) single woman; or
  (e) single man.

N/A

Paragraph 18.2

Consultation Question 110.

1.147 We invite consultees who have experience of applying for a parental order in the UK to tell us:

(1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
(2) whether they had legal advice before the making of the parental order;
(3) whether they were represented by a lawyer in court; and
(4) the cost of any legal advice or representation.

N/A

Paragraph 18.4

Consultation Question 111.

1.148 We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 18.6

Consultation Question 112.

1.149 We invite consultees to tell us what they have paid for, or to provide evidence about the cost of:

(1) medical screening; and
(2) implications counselling

(where possible separating out the cost of such screening, tests or implications counselling from any other costs involved with fertility treatment).

N/A

1.150 We invite legal consultees, who advise on surrogacy and parental order proceedings, to provide evidence of what they would charge:

(1) to provide advice sufficient to meet the proposed requirement for independent legal advice discussed in Chapter 13; and

(2) to draft, advise on and negotiate the written surrogacy agreement required for the new pathway.

N/A

Paragraph 18.8

Consultation Question 113.

1.151 We invite consultees to tell us of the impact of:

(1) the current requirement of a genetic link; and

(2) any removal of this requirement in cases of medical necessity:

(a) in the new pathway;

(b) in the parental order route for domestic surrogacy arrangements; or

(c) in both situations.

Paragraph 18.11

Consultation Question 114.

1.152 We invite consultees who consider that they might be able to fulfil the role of the independent professional discussed in Chapter 9 to tell us:

(1) their profession; and

(2) what they would charge to provide such a service.

N/A

Paragraph 18.13

Consultation Question 115.

1.153 We invite consultees who are intended parents to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

(1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and

(2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

1.154 We invite consultees who are surrogates to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

(1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and

(2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

Paragraph 18.15

Consultation Question 116.

1.155 We ask consultees who are intended parents to tell us:

(1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
(2) what they spent, in total, on the surrogacy arrangement(s) that led to the birth of their child(ren), including the cost of fertility treatment, payments to the surrogate and payments to any surrogacy agency or organisation;
(3) how they raised the funds for the surrogacy arrangement(s);
(4) what they spent on any fertility treatment prior to entering into a surrogacy arrangement (where that treatment did not lead to the birth of a child); and
(5) how they raised the funds for the fertility treatment.

N/A

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

1.156 We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

1.157 We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Tracking may be a helpful tool, particularly for the child born through surrogacy who wishes to find out their history

Yes

Please provide your views below:

DNA history is important from a medical perspective; a child should not be denied or obstructed from this by the law

56 Consultation Question 48: We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

Please provide your views below:

Yes. The person has a right to know their history, biological or otherwise

57 Consultation Question 49:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The person has a right to know their history, biological or otherwise

Please provide your views below:

The person has a right to know their history, biological or otherwise - certainly where the legal parents have consented and they have received due counselling then they should be able to access the information

58 Consultation Question 50: We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

Please provide your views below:

Care should be taken over direct biological relations for medical reasons - otherwise there should be no concerns. A surrogacy register will alleviate these related concerns and risks

59 Consultation Question 51:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We should not set ourselves up to reject the right of children having access to information that pertains to them and their biological relations.

68 Consultation Question 60: We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order. Limited impact in our case as we had complete trust in each other as a surrogacy team and no doubts that the parental order would be granted in due course. We have had however a negative experience from an administrative experience with the court to which we applied for the parental order. We applied for the PO in [redacted] and as of [redacted] it is still not granted due to a series of errors and continued lack of response from the court. This experience could conceivably place a lot of undue emotional stress on participants of surrogacy.

Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

(1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

(2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

(1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and

(2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

s://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

(1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;

(2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or

(3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

(1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,

(2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and

(3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless of whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

1.12 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;

(2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and

(3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

(1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;

(2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and

(3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. * https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

(1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;

(2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and

(3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

(1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;

(2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and

(3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

onsultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

(1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and

(2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Paragraph 8.77

Consultation Question 17.

1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

(1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:

(a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and

(b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or

(2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

(1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;

(2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and

(3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and

(2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

(1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and

(2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:

(a) administrative, or

(b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and

(2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

(1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and

(2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

1.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

(1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and

(2) they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

1.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

(1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and

(2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

1.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the 'intended parents' should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women's reproductive capacities.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

1.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

(2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.140

Consultation Question 30.

1.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

1.35 We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

N/A

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

1.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

1.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

1.38 We provisionally propose that:

(1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

(2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

(3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

1.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

(1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;

(2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;

(3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;

(4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and

(5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

1.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving derive income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

1.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

1.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

1.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

1.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

1.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

1.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

1.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

1.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

1.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

1.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

1.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

1.55 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

1.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.57 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the register should be maintained by the Authority;

(2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:

(a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and

(b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and

(3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

1.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

1.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

(1) where his or her legal parents have consented;

(2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or

(3) in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

1.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

1.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

1.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

(1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or

(2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

1.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

1.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

1.67 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

(2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:

(a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or

(b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and

(3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

1.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

1.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

1.70 We invite consultees' views on whether:

(1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or

(2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

1.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

1.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

(1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but

(2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

1.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 12.64

Consultation Question 60.

1.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

1.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

1.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

(1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or

(2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.78 We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

1.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

1.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

(1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or

(2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

1.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

1.82 We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.83 We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.84 We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

1.85 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

1.86 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

1.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

1.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

(1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and

(2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

1.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

1.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

(1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;

(2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and

(3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

1.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

1.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

1.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

(1) based on an allowance;

(2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or

(3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

1.96 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and

(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

1.97 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and

(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

1.98 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and

(2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.29

Consultation Question 76.

1.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

1.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

(1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or

(2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

1.101 We invite consultees to share their experiences:

(1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and

(2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

1.102 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

(1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;

(2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or

(3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother compensation.

1.103 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother compensation.

1.104 We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

(1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or

(2) left to the parties to negotiate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother compensation.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

1.105 We invite consultees views' as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

1.106 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

(1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and

(2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

1.107 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.108 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

(1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or

(2) a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.109 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

(1) no other payments;

(2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;

(3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy;

(4) lost earnings;

(5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or

(6) gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to make any type of fee or payment to the birth mother for her 'services'.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

1.110 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

1.111 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

(1) in the first trimester of pregnancy only;

(2) to any miscarriage or termination; or

(3) some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

1.112 We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Paragraph 15.74

Consultation Question 85.

1.113 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

1.114 We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

1.115 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

(1) for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and

(2) for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

1.116 We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.117 We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Paragraph 15.99

Consultation Question 89.

1.118 We invite overseas surrogates (or bodies representing or advocating for surrogates) to share with us their experiences f international surrogacy arrangements.

N/A

Paragraph 16.10

Consultation Question 90.

1.119 We invite organisations focused on children's rights and welfare in the international context to share with us their views on our proposed reforms and consultation questions in this chapter.

N/A

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

1.120 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

1.121 We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

1.122 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

1.123 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

1.124 We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

1.125 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or

(2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.126 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

1.127 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 16.76

Consultation Question 96.

1.128 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

1.129 We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

1.130 We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

1.131 We provisionally propose that:

1.132 the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but

1.133 before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

1.134 We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

1.135 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

(1) any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and

(2) if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

1.136 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

1.137 We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

1.138 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and

(2) if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

1.139 We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

1.140 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

1.141 We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

1.142 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself. There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

1.143 We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

1.144 We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

1.145 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Paragraph 17.80

Consultation Question 109.

1.146 We invite consultees who are intended parents, live in the UK, and have entered into a surrogacy arrangement that led to the birth of a child to tell us:

(1) when the child was born;

(2) whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;

(3) whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and

(4) whether they are a:

(a) opposite-sex couple;

(b) male same-sex couple;

(c) female same-sex couple;

(d) single woman; or

(e) single man.

N/A

Paragraph 18.2

Consultation Question 110.

1.147 We invite consultees who have experience of applying for a parental order in the UK to tell us:

(1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;

(2) whether they had legal advice before the making of the parental order;

(3) whether they were represented by a lawyer in court; and

(4) the cost of any legal advice or representation.

N/A

Paragraph 18.4

Consultation Question 111.

1.148 We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 18.6

Consultation Question 112.

1.149 We invite consultees to tell us what they have paid for, or to provide evidence about the cost of:

(1) medical screening; and

(2) implications counselling

(where possible separating out the cost of such screening, tests or implications counselling from any other costs involved with fertility treatment).

N/A

1.150 We invite legal consultees, who advise on surrogacy and parental order proceedings, to provide evidence of what they would charge:

(1) to provide advice sufficient to meet the proposed requirement for independent legal advice discussed in Chapter 13; and

(2) to draft, advise on and negotiate the written surrogacy agreement required for the new pathway.

N/A

Paragraph 18.8

Consultation Question 113.

1.151 We invite consultees to tell us of the impact of:

(1) the current requirement of a genetic link; and

(2) any removal of this requirement in cases of medical necessity:

(a) in the new pathway;

(b) in the parental order route for domestic surrogacy arrangements; or

(c) in both situations.

Paragraph 18.11

Consultation Question 114.

1.152 We invite consultees who consider that they might be able to fulfil the role of the independent professional discussed in Chapter 9 to tell us:

(1) their profession; and

(2) what they would charge to provide such a service.

Paragraph 18.13

Consultation Question 115.

1.153 We invite consultees who are intended parents to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

(1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and

(2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

1.154 We invite consultees who are surrogates to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

(1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and

(2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

Paragraph 18.15

Consultation Question 116.

1.155 We ask consultees who are intended parents to tell us:

(1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;

(2) what they spent, in total, on the surrogacy arrangement(s) that led to the birth of their child(ren), including the cost of fertility treatment, payments to the surrogate and payments to any surrogacy agency or organisation;

(3) how they raised the funds for the surrogacy arrangement(s);

(4) what they spent on any fertility treatment prior to entering into a surrogacy arrangement (where that treatment did not lead to the birth of a child); and

(5) how they raised the funds for the fertility treatment.

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

1.156 We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

1.157 We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Chapter 6: The parental order procedure

8 Consultation Question 1:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

Please provide your views below:

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

9 Consultation Question 2:

10 Consultation Question 3: We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Please provide your views below:

11 Consultation Question 4:

No

Please provide your views below:

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

12 Consultation Question 5: We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the Family Procedure Rules 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. Do consultees agree?

Chapter 8: Legal Parenthood: Proposals for Reform - A New Pathway

14 Consultation Question 7:

No

Please provide your views below:

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

16 Consultation Question 9: We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

17 Consultation Question 10: We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

18 Consultation Question 11:

No

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

19 Consultation Question 12:

Other

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

21 Consultation Question 14:

No

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

22 Consultation Question 15:

No

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

Yes

Please share your views below:

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

23 Consultation Question 16:

No

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

No

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

26 Consultation Question 19:

No

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

Please provide your views below:

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

27 Consultation Question 20:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

28 Consultation Question 21: We invite consultees' views as to: (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

29 Consultation Question 22:

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. 30 Consultation Question 23:

Please provide your views below:

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

31 Consultation Question 24:

Please provide your views below:

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. 32 Consultation Question 25: We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Please provide your views below:

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

33 Consultation Question 26:

No

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

34 Consultation Question 27:

No

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. 35 Consultation Question 28: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.Do consultees agree?

Please provide your views below:

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the 'intended parents' should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

42 Consultation Question 35: We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

43 Consultation Question 36: We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

Please provide your views below:

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

44 Consultation Question 37: We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

45 Consultation Question 37: We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

46 Consultation Question 38: We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

Please provide your views below:

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

47 Consultation Question 39: We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood. Do consultees agree?

48 Consultation Question 40: We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms). Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

49 Consultation Question 41: We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

50 Consultation Question 42: We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Chapter 10: Children's Access to Information About Surrogacy Arrangements

51 Consultation Question 43: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

52 Consultation Question 44: We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

53 Consultation Question 45: We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

Please provide your views below:

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

54 Consultation Question 46: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.Do consultees agree?

55 Consultation Question 47:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Other

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

56 Consultation Question 48: We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

Please provide your views below:

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

62 Consultation Question 54: We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished. Do consultees agree?

No. The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

63 Consultation Question 55:

No

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Chapter 12: Eligibility Criteria for Both a Parental Order and for the New Pathway

64 Consultation Question 56:

No

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

65 Consultation Question 57:

Please provide your views below:

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

66 Consultation Question 58: We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them. Do consultees agree?

Please provide views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the ‘new pathway’ and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

68 Consultation Question 60: We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the ‘new pathway’ and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a ‘medical necessity.’

69 Consultation Question 61: We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent’s former partner provides gametes but the intended parents’ relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order. Please provide your views below:

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the ‘new pathway’. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

Yes

Please provide your views below:

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

72 Consultation Question 64:

No

Please provide your views below:

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Other

Please provide your views below:

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

78 Consultation Question 70: We invite consultees’ views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the ‘new pathway’.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple ‘surrogate’ pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Chapter 15: Payments to the Surrogate: Options for Reform

80 Consultation Question 72:

Please provide your views below:

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women’s reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

86 Consultation Question 78:

87 Consultation Question 79:

Please provide your views below:

It is absurd to propose that one could place a monetary value on the pain of adverse pregnancy outcomes. In putting a price tag on perineal tear for example, some mothers report little pain or symptoms, others have profound ongoing fear of vaginal penetration, which can result in very significant emotional and relationship difficulties. Infection may complicate healing, and some women report long term sequelae from this, such as impaired wound healing.

Haematology conditions should also be considered. Blood loss, for example due to placental haemorrhage can be very significant, and potentially result in emergency hysterectomy and blood transfusion to save the life of the mother. It is a fact that although blood is thoroughly screened in the UK there still remains the potential for blood borne illnesses to be transmitted, and the fact that some of these may not have been identified yet by researchers is also a real risk to a mother receiving transfusion. Persons who have had a blood transfusion are currently unable to donate blood themselves in the UK, due to the risk of (vCJD) transmission. This is an indication of the gravity of receiving blood products.

No medical intervention is EVER risk free. Receiving multiple blood products in the context of Massive Transfusion Protocol (eg platelets, Fresh Frozen Plasma, cryoprecipitate) only heighten those risks.

Conditions such as HELLP (Haemolysis, Elevated Liver enzymes, Low Platelets) can be fatal, and although the maternal mortality rate is low, it can have significant sequelae, including renal failure potentially requiring dialysis, placental abruption (potentially fatal for mother and baby) permanent liver damage and retinal detachment resulting in visual impairment.

Each of these conditions have long term consequences for a woman, psychologically, physically and emotionally, and may also affect her ability to return to work or care for other children.

Also, the late complications of childbirth have been disregarded. Late consequences of childbirth can include vaginal or rectal prolapse, urinary and faecal incontinence. Women who have had a C section may experience ongoing pain around the scar. Some sources quote this as affecting between 6 and 18 percent of women. These symptoms can be profoundly distressing, and may take years to present (conversely, may present immediately).

How could we ensure that women suffering these complications are compensated? They are multifactorial, and risk increases with instrumented delivery and parity. How would it be proposed to unpick the role of a surrogate pregnancy in causing these symptoms in relation to other risk factors, for example parity, smoking history, personal medical history?

Psychiatric conditions are also absent from this list. Complications including depression and anxiety may be worsened by pregnancy. Other mental health conditions such as post natal depression and post partum psychosis can be fatal, and impact on a woman's health for many years to come. I'm quite shocked that none of these conditions have been explicitly mentioned and it does make me wonder how the list of complications was created. I'd also like to know what level of haemorrhage would be considered "excessive".

The wording of the question "should" be able to pay compensation is not the same as being mandated to do so. This potentially creates a situation where some "luckier" women would receive compensation others would not.

All of the above illustrates the risks of surrogacy and confirms my support for a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur’s key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of ‘parenthood’ should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Chapter 17: Miscellaneous Issues

109 Consultation Question 101: We invite consultees’ views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate’s spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

Please provide your views below:

I do not believe this needs changing.

110 Consultation Question 102: We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies. Do consultees agree?

No

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

112 Consultation Question 104: We invite consultees’ views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

Please provide your views below:

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

113 Consultation Question 105: We invite consultees’ views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

115 Consultation Question 107:

Please provide your views below:

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself. There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

At a time when the NHS is under severe strain, and life changing therapies (for cancer, cystic fibrosis etc) are not funded due to financial constraints it is a slap in the face to provide money for prospective parents to indulge their parenting fantasies while denying patients access to drugs which are standard of care in other counties.

Please provide your views below:

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

Please provide your views below:

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

116 Consultation Question 108: We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

Please provide your views below:

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

126 Consultation Question 118: We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this Consultation Paper.

Please provide your views below:

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

• Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
• Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
• Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

 The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
 All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
 The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
 Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
 Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Short Form Questionnaire: Law Commissions' Surrogacy Consultation

This form is an extract of the longer form for comments and responses to the Law Commission's and the Scottish Law Commission's consultation about reforming surrogacy law. If you would like to respond to the full version of our consultation questionnaire, please use the online form: https://consult.justice.gov.uk/law-commission/surrogacy. Please see our websites for further details, and for links to download the full consultation paper: https://www.lawcom.gov.uk/project/surrogacy/ and https://www.scotlawcom.gov.uk/law-reform/law-reform-projects/joint-projects/surrogacy/.

We have selected 46 questions which may be of particular interest of those with lived experience of surrogacy arrangements: surrogates, intended parents, family members and adult children born of surrogacy arrangements. You do not need to answer all the questions if you do not want to, and you can write as much or as little as you would like in response to our questions.

Please note that we may publish or disclose information you provide us in response to this consultation, including personal information. We ask consultees, when providing their responses, if they could avoid including personal identifying information in the text of their response, particularly where this may reveal the identities of other people involved in their surrogacy arrangement.

For more information about how we consult and how we may use responses to the consultation, please see page i – ii of the Consultation Paper.

Question No.	Consultation Question
Q1	Consultation Question 7. In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have: (1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth, (2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and (3) met eligibility requirements, on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q1	No. While I completely agree with the presumption that the IPs should be the legal parents, I see no necessity for the right to object (see question 11).
Q2	Consultation Question 11. We provisionally propose that:

	(1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child; (2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and (3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q2	No – if an agreement has been entered into between the surrogate and IPs prior to conception, with both parties entering into it of their own free will, I think that this agreement should be absolutely binding. IPs need to be confident that the baby they believe to be theirs cannot be taken away from them. Assuming that the relevant screening and assessments have been carried out prior to conception, I can see no reason why the surrogate would change her mind, other than on a whim, and it is unreasonable to expect the IPs to live with this sort of anxiety. I believe the purpose of revising the law is to provide absolute clarity, and this provision creates an unnecessary grey area.
Q3	Consultation Question 12. We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that: (1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child; (2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and (3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q3	No, see answer to Question 11
Q4	Consultation Question 15. We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

Your Response to Q4	I don't believe that the spouse / partner of the surrogate should be listed on the birth certificate. The current law means that there is a premium on single surrogates, and that married women who wish to be surrogates are not chosen. Given that the spouse of the surrogate has no biological claim over the child, it seems totally illogical that they should be listed on the child's birth certificate.
Q5	Consultation Question 27. We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway: (1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and (2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q5	Yes, as I have already mentioned I don't believe that the surrogate should have the right to object, but I absolutely think that the IPs should immediately acquire parental responsibility.
Q6	Consultation Question 28. We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q6	No – I think that from birth parental responsibility should rest with the IPs. There are often crucial medical decisions that need to be taken immediately after the birth, and there should be no confusion regarding whose opinion holds the most sway – i.e. it should be a decision taken solely by the IPs
Q7	Consultation Question 29. For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and (2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.
Your Response to Q7	Yes – I believe that the surrogate should not share any form of parental responsibility post-birth.
Q8	Consultation Question 55. We provisionally propose that:

	(1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available; (2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances: (a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or (b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and (3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q8	Yes
Q9	Consultation Question 30. We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q9	No, in circumstances where the surrogate is the biological mother, it is a different legal and moral matter.
Q10	Consultation Question 32. We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway. We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.
Your Response to Q10	I think that it should be a joint decision for the IPs and surrogate as to whether they wish their surrogacy process to be independent, for example with a close family member, or whether they wish to continue under the government pathway. I imagine that the vast majority of cases would fall within the latter group, and by requiring couples to register the surrogacy process this would then make it subject to the law, and both IPs and surrogates would enjoy the protection provided to them. Should people choose not to register their surrogacy process, and to continue independently of the process, outside of the protection of the law, then this would presumably be a joint decision, and they would be acknowledging that the process would have no form of governance.
Q11	Consultation Question 67.

	We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway: (1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and (2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q11	Yes. We found counselling to be key in our surrogacy process.
Q12	Consultation Question 68. We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q12	Yes, although I think that this would potentially be hard to implement. In situations where there is an economic disparity between surrogates and IPs it could be difficult for the surrogate to obtain a legal opinion. Were she to rely on the IPs to fund it then it would be hard to argue that it was genuinely independent.
Q13	Consultation Question 88. We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q13	Yes; no. I believe that a surrogacy contract which contains financial provisions should absolutely be enforceable by the surrogate. However, the contract will contain both financial and lifestyle provisions, and I see no legal basis whatsoever for allowing a surrogate to breach part of the contract (i.e. the lifestyle provisions) and still expect the financial part to be fully upheld. I believe that every aspect of the contract should be legally binding, and thus any breach of contract should lead to a forfeiture of rights.
Q14	Consultation Question 42.

	We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q14	Yes – the current advertising ban causes enormous problems in recruiting surrogates and this would be extremely helpful.
Q15	Consultation Question 62. We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity: (1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or (2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made. We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.
Your Response to Q15	I think that in case 1 there should be a requirement for medical necessity. Most clinics have fairly clear criteria regarding what is classed as a medical necessity, i.e. either the inability to produce eggs / carry a child, or a situation whereby carrying a child would endanger the life of the mother. As such asking for confirmation of this from an HFEA-registered clinic seems to be fairly straightforward. However, for those who choose to opt out of the official process and proceed independently, i.e. 2, I believe that there should be no restrictions, and anybody should be entitled to undertake surrogacy.
Q16	Consultation Question 70. We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.
Your Response to Q16	Yes – from both a medical and psychological perspective I think it is crucial that the surrogate has given birth
Q17	Consultation Question 33. We provisionally propose that: (1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations; (2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and (3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q17	Yes

Q18	Consultation Question 35. We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q18	Yes. I think that the issue of surrogacy organisations having "affiliate" law firms also needs to be examined, as this seems to be a very easy-to-exploit loophole allowing surrogacy organisations to monetise the process.
Q19	Consultation Question 37. We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.
Your Response to Q19	In the first case – yes. Both IPs and surrogates would appreciate the endorsement given by an agency, and would like to know that the other party has been properly vetted and checked for any issues. However, I don't believe that it is right, or practical, to preclude people from using family members / friends / other personal contacts as a surrogate, and should people wish to do so, they should be able to proceed without an agency's involvement.
Q20	Consultation Question 59. We provisionally propose that the new pathway – (1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but (2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements. We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q20	I believe that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, and should be permitted under all pathways, but only with stringent medical checks

Q21	Consultation Question 46. We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q21	Yes
Q22	Consultation Question 47. We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that: (1) the register should be maintained by the Authority; (2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include: (a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and (b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and (3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q22	Yes
Q23	Consultation Question 48. We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.
Your Response to Q23	Yes
Q24	Consultation Question 49.

	We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances: (1) where his or her legal parents have consented; (2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or (3) in any other circumstances.
Your Response to Q24	No – I see no reason why a child would need to access this information prior to the age of consent, as if there is parental consent, parents would be able to share that information themselves.
Q25	Consultation Question 51. We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.
Your Response to Q25	No – I don't think that this should be permitted. The relationship between IPs and surrogates can vary, and if both parties prefer not to have a significant relationship after the birth this is something very personal. If a child has been born to IPs who take this view, then allowing their child to contact someone with whom they share no tie other than they were carried by the same surrogate, could be seen as invasive. If the child wishes to make contact with the surrogate at the age of 18, and she then facilitates this meeting, that is an entirely different thing.
Q26	Consultation Question 52. We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so: (1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or (2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

Your Response to Q26	Yes if they are genetically related, no if they are not
Q27	Consultation Question 53. For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.
Your Response to Q27	No – only those who apply for a parental order should be registered
Q28	Consultation Question 72. We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be: (1) based on an allowance; (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.
Your Response to Q28	The financial situation surrounding surrogacy needs to be clarified. I believe that surrogates should be paid (see later questions), and in that context, "costs" should be genuine costs actually incurred, which can be verified by receipt i.e. option 3
Q29	Consultation Question 73. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".
Your Response to Q29	Yes – the IPS should be able to pay the surrogate any essential expenses she incurs. Essential should include any medical expenses (including supplements and prescriptions), any transport expenses, any clothing expenses, and any expenses which have only arisen directly as a result of the surrogacy, eg babysitting necessary because the surrogate is attending a hospital appointment
Q30	Consultation Question 74. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

Your Response to Q30	No only essential costs should be covered (but I believe this should encompass a broad range, see Q73)
Q31	Consultation Question 75. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and (2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.
Your Response to Q31	Yes, any expenses that arise due to the potential surrogacy, such as travel costs or counselling, should be covered.
Q32	Consultation Question 76. We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).
Your Response to Q32	The surrogate should be compensated for any lost earnings due to childbirth or medical complications (unless she has maternity cover in which the IPs should not be liable). However, if the surrogate elects to stop working at an early point in the pregnancy, for no medical reason, then compensating her should be permitted, but a matter for negotiation between the IPs and the surrogate, rather than mandatory
Q33	Consultation Question 77. We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings: (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).
Your Response to Q33	Yes if it can be substantively proven and calculated – this shouldn't be a mechanism for inflating costs
Q34	Consultation Question 78. We invite consultees to share their experiences: (1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and (2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

Your Response to Q34	N/A
Q35	Consultation Question 79. We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following: (1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth; (2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or (3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy. We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation. We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be: (1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or (2) left to the parties to negotiate.
Your Response to Q35	The surrogate should be paid compensation for any invasive medical procedures, and any specified complications. I think that this should also include multiple births. This should be on the basis of a fixed fee schedule decided by the regulator
Q36	Consultation Question 80. We invite consultees views' as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.
Your Response to Q36	I think that all surrogates should have a mandatory entitlement to life assurance paid for by the IPs, but IPs should not be expected to contribute any further payments on the occasion of a surrogate's death
Q37	Consultation Question 81. We invite consultees' views as to whether: (1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and (2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.
Your Response to Q37	Yes – gifts are a crucial way of showing goodwill to the surrogate, but clearly the cost of these gifts needs to be capped to prevent them being used as a way of circumventing any cap on the overall compensation – a cap should be set by the regulator at a level they consider appropriate

Q38	Consultation Question 82. We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be: (1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or (2) a fixed fee set by the regulator. We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee: (1) no other payments; (2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy; (3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy; (4) lost earnings; (5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or (6) gifts.
Your Response to Q38	Yes it should be possible to pay a surrogate. This should be a fixed fee negotiated between the surrogate and the IPs, but the level of this fee should be capped by the regulator. In addition to this "base" fee, the surrogate should also receive the aforementioned costs listed in 2 – 6 above
Q39	Consultation Question 84. We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q39	Yes
Q40	Consultation Question 85. We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.
Your Response to Q40	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q41	Consultation Question 92.

	We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q41	Yes
Q42	Consultation Question 94. We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that: (1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or (2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.
Your Response to Q42	Yes
Q43	Consultation Question 95. We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child. Do consultees agree?

Your Response to Q43	Yes
Q44	Consultation Question 97. We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q44	Yes
Q45	Consultation Question 99. We provisionally propose that: the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q45	Yes
Q46	Consultation Question 107. We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area. We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales. We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.
Your Response to Q46	I think that the IPs should be kept in the loop at all times throughout the pregnancy by midwives. The way in which the situation is handled after the birth also needs to change, but I imagine that this would automatically do so as a result of the changes to the law.

Chapter 6: The parental order procedure

8 Consultation Question 1:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

All International surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a Judge of the High Court. There is a history of International surrogacy abuse and exploitation and a high level of scrutiny should be maintained.

Please provide your views below:

9 Consultation Question 2:

Please provide your views below:

All international surrogacy cases should require a legal parental order post-birth and be dealt with at the current level of the judiciary, so that parental order processes, involving qualified social work assessments can take place.

10 Consultation Question 3: We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

12 Consultation Question 5: We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the Family Procedure Rules 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. Chapter 8: Legal Parenthood: Proposals for Reform - A New Pathway

14 Consultation Question 7:

No

Please provide your views below:

No. The Intended parents should not be documented as the legal parents at birth. This would reduce the birth mother to a vessel, a container, such knowledge of which would be detrimental to the mental health of the child, and against the healthy formation of their identity. This proposal weakens the surrogate's right to change her mind.

15 Consultation Question 8:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

100 years; or

Please provide your views below:

16 Consultation Question 9: We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements, otherwise this limits the right of the child to discover their genetic identity and may risk attraction to closely related persons.

17 Consultation Question 10: We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

18 Consultation Question 11:

No

Please provide your views below:

The surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal status by the Intended Parents immediately after the birth and before the baby is handed over. This consultation takes no account of the natural link between birth mother and baby and assumes an immediate hand-over, whether the birth mother objects or not. The birth mother should have the right to change her mind.

Short Form Questionnaire: Law Commissions' Surrogacy Consultation

This form is an extract of the longer form for comments and responses to the Law Commission's and the Scottish Law Commission's consultation about reforming surrogacy law. If you would like to respond to the full version of our consultation questionnaire, please use the online form: https://consult.justice.gov.uk/law-commission/surrogacy. Please see our websites for further details, and for links to download the full consultation paper: https://www.lawcom.gov.uk/project/surrogacy/ and https://www.scotlawcom.gov.uk/law-reform/law-reform-projects/joint-projects/surrogacy/.

We have selected 46 questions which may be of particular interest of those with lived experience of surrogacy arrangements: surrogates, intended parents, family members and adult children born of surrogacy arrangements. You do not need to answer all the questions if you do not want to, and you can write as much or as little as you would like in response to our questions.

Please note that we may publish or disclose information you provide us in response to this consultation, including personal information. We ask consultees, when providing their responses, if they could avoid including personal identifying information in the text of their response, particularly where this may reveal the identities of other people involved in their surrogacy arrangement.

For more information about how we consult and how we may use responses to the consultation, please see page i – ii of the Consultation Paper.

Question No.	Consultation Question
Q1	Consultation Question 7. In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have: (1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth, (2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and (3) met eligibility requirements, on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q1	Yes
Q2	Consultation Question 11. We provisionally propose that:

	(1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child; (2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and (3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q2	No
Q3	Consultation Question 12. We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that: (1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child; (2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and (3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q3	No
Q4	Consultation Question 15. We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.
Your Response to Q4	Yes
Q5	Consultation Question 27.

	We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway: (1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and (2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q5	Yes
Q6	Consultation Question 28. We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q6	No
Q7	Consultation Question 29. For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and (2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.
Your Response to Q7	Only IP's should have parental responsibility.
Q8	Consultation Question 55. We provisionally propose that: (1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available; (2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:

	(a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or (b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and (3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q8	Yes
Q9	Consultation Question 30. We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q9	Yes
Q10	Consultation Question 32. We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway. We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.
Your Response to Q10	All surrogacy arrangements should be within the scope of the new pathway – traditional, independent or otherwise. This should apply throughout the whole of the UK. I.e. any new laws/pathways must be the same throught Scotland, England, Wales and Northern Ireland.
Q11	Consultation Question 67. We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway: (1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and (2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15. Do consultees agree?

Your Response to Q11	Yes
Q12	Consultation Question 68. We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q12	I'm not sure. If agreements were to become legally binding then yes, I agree.
Q13	Consultation Question 88. We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q13	Yes
Q14	Consultation Question 42. We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q14	Yes
Q15	Consultation Question 62. We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity: (1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or (2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made. We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

Your Response to Q15	A doctor's or fertility clinic's report should suffice.
Q16	Consultation Question 70. We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.
Your Response to Q16	No, some surrogates do not wish to have their own children. I see no problem with this.
Q17	Consultation Question 33. We provisionally propose that: (1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations; (2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and (3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q17	Yes
Q18	Consultation Question 35. We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q18	Yes
Q19	Consultation Question 37. We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.
Your Response to Q19	To some extent. There are many current independent arrangements which run smoothly.
Q20	Consultation Question 59.

	We provisionally propose that the new pathway – (1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but (2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements. We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q20	I agree, so long as there is medical necessity. I'm not sure why international surrogacy should be any different to surrogacy in the UK though.
Q21	Consultation Question 46. We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q21	Yes
Q22	Consultation Question 47. We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that: (1) the register should be maintained by the Authority; (2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include: (a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and

	(b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and (3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q22	Yes
Q23	Consultation Question 48. We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.
Your Response to Q23	I see no reason not to. As IP's, we intend to be fully open with our child about their circumstances of birth.
Q24	Consultation Question 49. We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances: (1) where his or her legal parents have consented; (2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or (3) in any other circumstances.
Your Response to Q24	I agree, for anyone over the age of 18.
Q25	Consultation Question 51. We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so. Do consultees agree?

	We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.
Your Response to Q25	Yes
Q26	Consultation Question 52. We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so: (1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or (2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.
Your Response to Q26	I don't see why not. Currently, in most cases, these children tend to know each other anyway. This is certainly the case within my organisation (Surrogacy UK).
Q27	Consultation Question 53. For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.
Your Response to Q27	Yes, they should still be on the register.
Q28	Consultation Question 72. We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be: (1) based on an allowance; (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.
Your Response to Q28	(3) payment should be based on actial costs incurred, with receipts available.
Q29	Consultation Question 73. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and

	(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".
Your Response to Q29	All pregnancy expenses (such as clothing, travel to appointments, vitamins, etc) plus others indirectly related to pregnancy – loss of earnings, extra childcare, etc.
Q30	Consultation Question 74. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.
Your Response to Q30	I think the currect situation is preferable. 'Additional costs' make it seem too much like commercial surrogacy.
Q31	Consultation Question 75. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and (2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.
Your Response to Q31	As above – all costs incurred during the pregnancy, from travel to clinics to loss of earnings.
Q32	Consultation Question 76. We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).
Your Response to Q32	Yes, a surrogate should not lose out on earnings.
Q33	Consultation Question 77. We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings: (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).
Your Response to Q33	I'm not sure. This may be difficult to calculate to a degree of accuracy.

Q34	Consultation Question 78. We invite consultees to share their experiences: (1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and (2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.
Your Response to Q34	If a surrogate is only reimbursed for expenses, this should have not affect their social welfare payments.
Q35	Consultation Question 79. We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following: (1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth; (2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or (3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy. We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation. We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be: (1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or (2) left to the parties to negotiate.
Your Response to Q35	I think compensation should probably be capped. It should be paid if, for example, a caesarean section requires additional loss of earnings or inconvenience.
Q36	Consultation Question 80. We invite consultees views' as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.
Your Response to Q36	Caompensation should be covered through life insurance which is paid for by IPs.
Q37	Consultation Question 81.

	We invite consultees' views as to whether: (1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and (2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.
Your Response to Q37	Yes, gifts should be allowed, but within reason – not a sports car, for example.
Q38	Consultation Question 82. We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be: (1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or (2) a fixed fee set by the regulator. We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee: (1) no other payments; (2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy; (3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy; (4) lost earnings; (5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or (6) gifts.
Your Response to Q38	I don't think it should be possible to 'hire' a surrogate. I believe surrogates do not want this either. All payments should come under expenses.
Q39	Consultation Question 84. We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q39	Yes

Q40	Consultation Question 85. We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.
Your Response to Q40	I don't think so.
Q41	Consultation Question 92. We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q41	Yes
Q42	Consultation Question 94. We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that: (1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or (2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.
Your Response to Q42	I'm not well versed in international surrogacy laws, but any child born abroad, with British IP's, should be able to secure a British passport within a defined time – e.g. 2 weeks. I believe many IP's currently need to wait weeks or months before bringing their child home. I think this is unacceptable.

Q43	Consultation Question 95. We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q43	I don't know enough about this to comment.
Q44	Consultation Question 97. We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q44	Yes
Q45	Consultation Question 99. We provisionally propose that: the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q45	Yes
Q46	Consultation Question 107. We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area. We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

	We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.
Your Response to Q46	Health services, including midwives, should receive training on surrogacy. They must recognise and include IP's in all decision making.

Chapter 6: The parental order procedure

8 Consultation Question 1:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Please provide your views below:

Such cases should be allocated to a judge of the High Court but if they are not automatically allocated then Circuit Judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

9 Consultation Question 2:

Please provide your views below:

Domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should allocated to Circuit Judges and a ticketing system should apply. The domestic cases which do not fall into the new pathway are likely to be more complicated and would certainly benefit from judicial continuity which is rare in cases heard by lay justices.

10 Consultation Question 3: We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

11 Consultation Question 4:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

12 Consultation Question 5: We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the Family Procedure Rules 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. 16 Consultation Question 9: We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

17 Consultation Question 10: We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

This should prevent the arrangement from entering the new pathway.

18 Consultation Question 11:

No

Please provide your views below:

Rather than there being a right to object, the surrogate should consent. A consent is a positive experience whereas lack of objection could be seen as not caring for a child born through surrogacy. A consent provides a clear document to all parties, whereas a lack of objection is less clear.

19 Consultation Question 12:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

20 Consultation Question 13:

No

Please provide your views below:

Capacity can be a complicated issue and the lay person cannot be expected to understand this. A solicitor for example is unable to sign a certificate of capacity to conduct proceedings. This difficulty would hopefully be removed if an affirmative consent were given and such consent was witnessed by a professional who has been involved within the process.

21 Consultation Question 14:

No

Please provide your views below:

The welfare of the child assessments undertaken by clinics can be cursory and is mainly reliant upon self reporting in relation to the intended parents. it is unclear why the surrogate's GP is contacted but not the intended parent(s)as these will be the people raising any child. I can see no reason why the intended parent (s)' GP cannot be asked if there are any welfare of the concerns nor why there cannot be a social services check much like the current cafcass safeguarding checks.

Whilst those working in clinics are highly skilled their expertise is often not in child welfare. There should be someone whose expertise lies in child welfare providing part of the welfare assessment and providing support and guidance to parties about child welfare issues.

Different clinics may take different views about child welfare. If there a refusal to treat the Code of Practice apparently allows information to be shared but a clinic will not be able to share information to all clinics. There are limited circumstances in which the opportunity to share information arises, e.g. in the event that gametes are to be transferred from one clinic to another. As many clinics are privately owned it is hard for a patient to challenge a decision to refuse to treat, for example a decision may not be judicially reviewed.

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.Do consultees agree?

Yes

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

Please provide your views below:

I agree that it should not proceed in the new pathway and that the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

I would support 1 a) or 2.

27 Consultation Question 20:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

although the second intended parent should still be afforded the opportunity to make the application at any time prior to the making of a parental order, new information or circumstances should arise and it may be appropriate for the second intended parent to make the application.
An applicant should be warned that the consequences of not being truthful could lead to any parental order being revoked.

28 Consultation Question 21: We invite consultees' views as to: (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

Please provide your views below:

29 Consultation Question 22:

Please provide your views below:

There should be a social work assessment of the proposed arrangement before the new pathway should be entered into.
The oversight should be administrative but there should be a judicial process in the event of a dispute.

30 Consultation Question 23:

Please provide your views below:

The welfare checklist is sufficient.

31 Consultation Question 24:

Please provide your views below:

The checklist does not need amendment.

32 Consultation Question 25: We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Please provide your views below:

Yes this would be sensible.

36 Consultation Question 29:

Please provide your views below:

I would not propose a restriction, any disputes should be dealt with in the courts.

Chapter 9: The Regulation of Surrogacy Arrangements

37 Consultation Question 30: We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

Parenthood of a biological and birth mother should not be extinguished following a lack of objection. There should be an affirmative consent and this should be witnessed, preferably by a professional involved in the pathway to ensure that there has been no intimidation.

38 Consultation Question 31: We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

but there should be further guidance on what constitutes medical necessity, such guidance to be informed by medical professionals. The decision to move to donor gametes is a very personal one, some people will continue using their gametes even though their chances are very low others will make the decision to move to donated gametes. The surrogate's welfare should also be taken into consideration by the doctor when determining medical necessity. The medical treatment involved to get to embryo transfer is invasive, requires frequent monitoring and the drugs can cause unpleasant side effects- is it fair on a surrogate to undergo repeated cycles where the chances of success are small? The doctor should also consider the risk of miscarriage.

68 Consultation Question 60: We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order. Do consultees agree?

69 Consultation Question 61: We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order. Do consultees agree?

Short Form Questionnaire: Law Commissions' Surrogacy Consultation

This form is an extract of the longer form for comments and responses to the Law Commission's and the Scottish Law Commission's consultation about reforming surrogacy law. If you would like to respond to the full version of our consultation questionnaire, please use the online form: https://consult.justice.gov.uk/law-commission/surrogacy. Please see our websites for further details, and for links to download the full consultation paper: https://www.lawcom.gov.uk/project/surrogacy/ and https://www.scotlawcom.gov.uk/law-reform/law-reform-projects/joint-projects/surrogacy/.

We have selected 46 questions which may be of particular interest of those with lived experience of surrogacy arrangements: surrogates, intended parents, family members and adult children born of surrogacy arrangements. You do not need to answer all the questions if you do not want to, and you can write as much or as little as you would like in response to our questions.

Please note that we may publish or disclose information you provide us in response to this consultation, including personal information. We ask consultees, when providing their responses, if they could avoid including personal identifying information in the text of their response, particularly where this may reveal the identities of other people involved in their surrogacy arrangement.

For more information about how we consult and how we may use responses to the consultation, please see page i – ii of the Consultation Paper.

HOW TO SUBMIT YOUR RESPONSE USING THIS QUESTIONNAIRE

Type your response into the text fields below and then save your completed form. When you have completed your response, email the completed form as an attachment to surrogacy@lawcommission.gov.uk.

The closing date for submitting a response to our consultation is 11 October 2019.

Question No.	Consultation Question
Q1	Consultation Question 7. In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have: (1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth, (2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and (3) met eligibility requirements, on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q1	Yes. As a surrogate I do not want to be the legal parent or have parental responsibility of a child that is not mine. It leaves me in a vulnerable position where the parents of a child I have given birth to could walk away from the arrangement and leave me with the child. I know this is a highly unlikely situation but it is just as real a possibility as a surrogate wanting to keep a baby so it is essential reforms are made to protect all parties involved, including the child.
Q2	Consultation Question 11.

	We provisionally propose that: (1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child; (2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and (3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q2	I do agree that a surrogate should have the right to object but on the following grounds: The right to object should only be on the grounds of safeguarding, i.e. the surrogate believes the child would be in danager should the Intended Parents (IPs) become the legal parents. This is to avoid a surrogate using the right to object as a means of revenge or holding the IPs to account over disagreements during the pregnancy (perceived or real) as seen in the case of AB discussed in the consultation paper. When entering a surrogacy arrangement, particularly if the steps proposed for the new pathway are followed, a surrogate will be fully aware of the implications of being a surrogate and has proactively chosen to carry a baby for the IP or IPs, and as such has already consented to them becoming the legal parents so should have no reason to object to them other than on the grounds of the welfare of the child. The right to object should be made in writing before birth and a surrogate should have to explain her reasons for the objection. There is no reason why the right to object should extend beyond the birth of the child. It could be argued that a surrogate may be influenced by hormonal changes in the period immediately following birth which would not be typical of her mindset when usually making important decisions. Her decision to become a surrogate would not have been made at such a time and the steps she will have to go through under the new pathway mean she will have made an informed choice to enter a surrogacy arrangement and that choice should not be overridden by a decision made at a more vunerable time. The current proposal of having the objection period as one week less than the period of birth registration is unpractical in terms of only giving a week's window for the registration to take place. It also creates a disparity across the UK as Scotland has a different registration period to England and Wales. It is also unclear that if this approach is adopted whether it is the home country of the surrogate or the IPs that will determine ther period of objection.
Q3	Consultation Question 12. We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that: (1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;

	(2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and (3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q3	If a surrogate objects then legal parenthood should be shared between the surrogate and all IPs, regardless of whether they subsequently appear on the birth certificate. The current law means that if a surrogate has a spouse or civil partner any intended parents are unable to become a legal parent at birth. It is vital for children born through surrogacy to have the right to have their intended parents recognised from birth and therefore at least one of the intended parents must be able to have legal parenthood from birth. In the case of an objection where IPs have to apply for a parental order, this should be able to be granted without the consent of the surrogate if the court is satisfied there are no safeguarding concerns that would stop the child living with the intended parents.
Q4	Consultation Question 15. We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.
Your Response to Q4	A surrogate's spose or civil partner should not be a legal parent in any circumstances.
Q5	Consultation Question 27. We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway: (1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and (2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q5	Yes I agree with both these propsals.

Q6	Consultation Question 28. We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q6	I believe the objection period should end prior to birth and therefore all parental responsibility should be with the intended parents from the moment of birth if no objection has been made. As a surrogate I do not want to have parental responsibility for a child that is not mine and who I have knowingly and willing carried for somebody else. I have made an active choice to help the IPs become parents and would like the law to respect that choice and recognise I am not the child's parent. If an objection is made then the parental responsibility should lie with whoever the child is residing with, which should be the intended parents by default unless a court or social services has made a different determination prior to birth.
Q7	Consultation Question 29. For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and (2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.
Your Response to Q7	As stated above, parental responsibility and residency of the child should automatically go to intended parents at birth, even where an objection has been made by the surrogate unless the courts or social services have determined otherwise prior to birth. If it is decided the objection period should be post birth and that a surrogate retains parental responisiblity then the right to exercise parental responsibility should only extend to whoever the child is living with.
Q8	Consultation Question 55. We provisionally propose that: (1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available; (2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances: (a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or (b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and (3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007. Do consultees agree?

Your Response to Q8	Yes, the courts should be able to consent to a parental order or determine where a child should live based on the welfare of the child alone and not have to depend on the consent of the surrogate.
Q9	Consultation Question 30. We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q9	Yes.
Q10	Consultation Question 32. We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway. We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.
Your Response to Q10	Yes independent arangements should come under the new pathway. If they follow the eligibility requirements for the pathway they will have gone through the same process as those arrangements made through an organisation. Paties of independent arrangements can submit their own evidence to the Authority that all requirements have been met prior to trying to conceive.
Q11	Consultation Question 67. We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway: (1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and (2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q11	I agree implications counselling is important so agree it should be a requirement of the new pathway. I believe however, that members of a surrogacy organisation should be able to meet this requirement through sessions such as the current membership and agreements sessions run for all members by Surrogacy UK, for example.

	I also think this requirement should be removed if the arrangement is for a sibling agreement where the surrogate and intended parents have previously had a successful surrogacy arrangement together.
Q12	Consultation Question 68. We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q12	This is not a current requirement for gamete donors or recipients so I do not believe it should be for surrogacy arrangements, particulary those made through an organisation. I think perhaps independent arrangements should have this requirement. I also believe exceptions should be made for sibling arrangements between the same surrogate and intended parents. I have particular concerns that this, along with the requirement for counselling and increased agency fees that will undoubtable happen should agencies become regulated, will increase the cost of surrogacy beyond the means of some intended parents who may otherwise be able to afford it. One of the aims of the reforms is to reduce the number of international surrogacy arangements but people may look at this option if surrogacy in the UK becomes unaffordable.
Q13	Consultation Question 88. We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q13	I strongly disagree with any part of a surrogacy arrangement being enforceable, including the financial terms. However, at present there are no checks done by Surrogacy UK that intended parents are in a financial postion to cover the expenses agreed with their surrogate, which leaves surrogates in a vunerable position. Also, if financial terms became enforceable then there would need to be lots of scope for flexibility to any changes of circumstances that may effect the level of expenses needed, for e.g. premature birth, c-section, a change in a surrogate's personal circumstances such as promotion meaning a higher loss of earnings than originally calculated would be needed, etc. etc. There are many circumstances that can effect the amount of expenses needed. So I would prefer for there to be a requirement for intended parents to provide evidence they can cover the financial costs of a surrogacy arrangement prior to trying to conceive. This could be surrogacy organisations requiring proof at time of membership or agreement, and in independent arrangements for the IPs to provide evidence to the surrogate or perhaps to the person they have gone to for the independent legal advice.

Q14	Consultation Question 42. We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q14	No. If the ban is lifted it should be restricted to surrogacy organisations being able to advertise that they exist, though I worry about cost implications to intended parent membership fees to cover this. I do not believe that either surrogates or IPs should be able to advertise either to be or for a surrogate.
Q15	Consultation Question 62. We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity: (1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or (2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made. We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.
Your Response to Q15	Yes there should be a medical need in all circumstances, surrogacy should not be used for convenience. The medical need must include phychological as well as physical medical conditions and should be proved through medical evidence such as a doctor's report.
Q16	Consultation Question 70. We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.
Your Response to Q16	Absolutley not, I strongly disagree with this proposal. In the consultation paper you site one of the reasons for this as a childless surrogate may be "less able to give informed consent about the decision to…give up the baby she gives brith to". This is an incredibly insulting statement to make. Surrogates in the UK (because of the altruistic aspect of UK surrogacy) actively choose to help another person become a parent. To imply a woman is not capable of making such a decision and it is some how unnatural for not wanting to keep a child she has given birth to, is very wrong. Surrogate's know their own minds and as consenting adults should not be patronised in this way. Surrogate's in the UK are not vunerable women, as some seem to suggest, we are intelligent and find it empowering to make the choice to do this. Any concerns about a childless surrogate losing her own fertility or perhaps having undiagnosed fertility problems of her own can be addressed at the implications counselling stage of the process and an informed choice can be made by the surrogate and intended parents as to whether to continue.
Q17	Consultation Question 33. We provisionally propose that: (1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

	(2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and (3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q17	Yes.
Q18	Consultation Question 35. We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q18	Yes, there should be no aspect of profit making in UK surrogacy so that it remains altruistic and so that surrogates and intended parents are not taken advantage of for monetary gain.
Q19	Consultation Question 37. We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.
Your Response to Q19	Yes. Anyone offering these services should be meeting agreed standards.
Q20	Consultation Question 59. We provisionally propose that the new pathway – (1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but (2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

	We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q20	Yes I agree to all of the above.
Q21	Consultation Question 46. We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q21	Yes.
Q22	Consultation Question 47. We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that: (1) the register should be maintained by the Authority; (2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include: (a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and (b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and (3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q22	Yes to all parts.
Q23	Consultation Question 48.

	We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.
Your Response to Q23	Yes they should, as proposed in the previous question.
Q24	Consultation Question 49. We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances: (1) where his or her legal parents have consented; (2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or (3) in any other circumstances.
Your Response to Q24	Yes I agree to the proposal about access at ages 16 and 18. Yes I believe a child under those ages should have access if criteria 1 and 2 are met above. They should also have access if there is a medical need to their genetic information.
Q25	Consultation Question 51. We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.
Your Response to Q25	Yes those genetically related should be able to identify each other. And yes a child born via a surrogate should have the option to consent to being identified by other children born via the same surrogate if not genetically related.
Q26	Consultation Question 52. We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

	(1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or (2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.
Your Response to Q26	Yes in both circumstances, surrogate's own children and those born via the same surrogate should be able to consent to identify each other if they wish, regardless of genetics.
Q27	Consultation Question 53. For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.
Your Response to Q27	Yes, a child should have full access to their origins, including intention not just genetics.
Q28	Consultation Question 72. We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be: (1) based on an allowance; (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.
Your Response to Q28	The current expenses system does work fine as it is, I am not sure why the law commission feels it needs to be changed. I believe education is needed in other government departments (DWP and HMRC for eg) that any monies received in a surrogacy arrangement are not income. So to answer this question the costs met by the intended parents should be the costs actually incurred by the surrogate, supported by a receipt where possible. Not every purchase can be evidenced by a receipt, for e.g. if a surrogate makes a provision for extra spend in her weekly shop to cover more healthy products, this could only be proved by a comparison in receipts before and during pregnancy which would not be practical. If a production of a receipt is required this suggests the surrogate should meet the costs of the pregnancy herself then be reimbursed. Some surrogates may not have the financial means for this. At Surrogacy UK a surrogate estimates her pregnancy expenses before a pregnancy is achieved and then once the pregnancy is achieved the intended parents cover these in 10 equal instalments four weekly. That way the surrogate has money in hand from the intended parents to make purchases needed. This system should be able to continue.
Q29	Consultation Question 73. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and

	(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".
Your Response to Q29	Of course intended parents should cover the costs of the pregnancy, they are costs they would incur should they have carried the pregnancy themselves. A surrogate should be able to determine what she requires expenses for and this will vary between surrogates to reflect their personal circumstances. Surrogates are not motivated by financial gain in the UK and already only include essentials costs in their expenses. They should not have to define or justify to anyone why an expense is essential. The Surrogacy UK recommended model of estimating expenses before a pregnancy is achieved and then splitting this into 10 equal instalments suring the pregnancy has been proven as an effective way of managing expenses and perhaps should be looked at as being adopted into these proposals rather than trying to define if one type of expense is "essential" or not.
Q30	Consultation Question 74. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.
Your Response to Q30	A surrogate should be able to determine what she requires expenses for and this will vary between surrogates to reflect their personal circumstances. Surrogates are not motivated by financial gain in the UK and already only include essentials costs in their expenses. They should not have to define or justify to anyone why an expense is essential.
Q31	Consultation Question 75. We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and (2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.
Your Response to Q31	A surrogate should be able to determine what she requires expenses for and this will vary between surrogates to reflect their personal circumstances. Surrogates are not motivated by financial gain in the UK and already only include essentials costs in their expenses. They should not have to define or justify to anyone why an expense is essential.
Q32	Consultation Question 76. We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).
Your Response to Q32	Yes. A surrogate should be able to determine what she requires expenses for and this will vary between surrogates to reflect their personal circumstances. Surrogates are not motivated by financial gain in the UK and already only include essentials costs in their expenses. They should not have to define or justify to anyone why an expense is essential.

Q33	Consultation Question 77. We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings: (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).
Your Response to Q33	Yes. A surrogate should be able to determine what she requires expenses for and this will vary between surrogates to reflect their personal circumstances. Surrogates are not motivated by financial gain in the UK and already only include essentials costs in their expenses. They should not have to define or justify to anyone why an expense is essential.
Q34	Consultation Question 78. We invite consultees to share their experiences: (1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and (2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.
Your Response to Q34	I have not had any personal experience of this.
Q35	Consultation Question 79. We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following: (1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth; (2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or (3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy. We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation. We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

	(1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or (2) left to the parties to negotiate.
Your Response to Q35	Part 1 of this question - A surrogate should be able to determine what she requires expenses for and this will vary between surrogates to reflect their personal circumstances. Surrogates are not motivated by financial gain in the UK and already only include essentials costs in their expenses. They should not have to define or justify to anyone why an expense is essential. If this includes treatments for any complications during or because of the pregnancy then that is understandable. By compensation though do you mean an additional sum not just the cost of the expenses themselves? If so then no, I firmly believe all monies given to a surrogate from the intended parents should be for costs incurred and therefore be expenses only. As a surrogate I am fully aware of all the potential complications and situations that can occur during conception, pregnancy and birth and accept these risks as part of the process.
Q36	Consultation Question 80. We invite consultees views' as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.
Your Response to Q36	No I do not agree with any compensation payments in surrogacy. I do believe it should be a requirement that IPs pay for life insurance for the surrogate from the time of trying to conceive through to a set period of time post birth, perhaps 6 or 12 months. Surrogacy UK already have this requirement for their members and I believe it is best practice and should be taken forward by the Law Commission as part of the requirement for the new legal pathway.
Q37	Consultation Question 81. We invite consultees' views as to whether: (1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and (2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.
Your Response to Q37	Yes IPs should be able to buy gifts and they should be reasonable in nature to ensure they are not used as a means of payment. I recognise, however, determining what is reasonable could be problematic.
Q38	Consultation Question 82. We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

	We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be: (1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or (2) a fixed fee set by the regulator. We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee: (1) no other payments; (2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy; (3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy; (4) lost earnings; (5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or (6) gifts.
Your Response to Q38	No, as a surrogate I am strongly opposed to the payment to a woman for being a surrogate. I believe this would lead to the explotation of surrogates and IPs. I also believe it would be detrimental to the child born through surrogacy to grow up believing they were bought or sold. It would also out price many IPs from accessing surrogacy in the UK and may cause an increase in international arrangements. The only monies that should be payable to the surrogate should be expenses only.
Q39	Consultation Question 84. We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q39	No payments should be made to surrogates, regardless of the route to legal parenthood for the IPs. Expenses only should be covered in both routes.
Q40	Consultation Question 85. We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.
Your Response to Q40	No, expenses only should be covered.
Q41	Consultation Question 92.

	We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q41	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q42	Consultation Question 94. We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules. Do consultees agree? We provisionally propose that: (1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or (2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate. Do consultees agree? We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.
Your Response to Q42	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q43	Consultation Question 95. We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child. Do consultees agree?

Your Response to Q43	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q44	Consultation Question 97. We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q44	Yes.
Q45	Consultation Question 99. We provisionally propose that: the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law. Do consultees agree?
Your Response to Q45	Click or tap here to enter text.
Q46	Consultation Question 107. We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area. We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales. We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.
Your Response to Q46	There are already government guidelines in place but it is clear from the experiences of surrogates and IPs I know that health services are not always aware of them or follow them. There needs to be a suitable education programme to ensure that health services know that the guidance exists and how to find it.

18 Consultation Question 11:

No

Please provide your views below:

This appears to be written with no thought to the difficulty of birth and the postpartum period, as well as the natural bond that exists between a birth mother and child. This also doesn't appear to have the child's best interests at heart. A surrogate mother should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal status by the Intended Parents immediately after the birth and before the baby is handed over.
Also consideration should be given to the importance of good attachment- a handover as though for the delivery of goods, dismisses the needs of the child and the mother at a very emotional time. A week is not enough time in this fragile postpartum period. I feel it should be a minimum of a month. One has six weeks to register a birth, let alone be certain about handing over the child one has carried. The surrogate mother is not simply a commodity in all of this.

Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

(1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

(2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

(1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and

(2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

(1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;

(2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or

(3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

(1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,

(2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and

(3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

1.12 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;

(2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and

(3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

(1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;

(2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and

(3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

(1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;

(2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and

(3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

(1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;

(2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and

(3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

(1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and

(2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Paragraph 8.77

Consultation Question 17.

1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

(1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:

(a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and

(b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or

(2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

(1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;

(2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and

(3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and

(2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

(1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and

(2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:

(a) administrative, or

(b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and

(2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

(1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and

(2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

1.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

(1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and

(2) they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

1.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

(1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and

(2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

1.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the 'intended parents' should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women's reproductive capacities.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

1.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

(2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Consultation Question 30.

1.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

1.35 We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

1.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

1.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

1.38 We provisionally propose that:

(1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

(2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

(3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

1.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

(1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;

(2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;

(3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;

(4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and

(5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

1.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

1.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

1.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

1.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

1.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

1.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

1.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

1.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

1.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

1.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

1.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

1.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

1.55 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

1.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.57 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the register should be maintained by the Authority;

(2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:

(a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and

(b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and

(3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

1.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

1.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

(1) where his or her legal parents have consented;

(2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or

(3) in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

1.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

1.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

1.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

(1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or

(2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

1.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

1.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

1.67 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

(2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:

(a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or

(b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and

(3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

1.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

1.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

1.70 We invite consultees' views on whether:

(1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or

(2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

1.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

1.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

(1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but

(2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

1.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 12.64

Consultation Question 60.

1.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

1.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

1.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

(1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or

(2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.78 We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

1.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

1.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

(1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or

(2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

1.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

1.82 We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.83 We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood.

I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.84 We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

1.85 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

1.86 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for a 'new pathway'. At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

1.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

1.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

(1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and

(2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

1.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

1.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

(1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;

(2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and

(3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

1.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

1.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

1.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

(1) based on an allowance;

(2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or

(3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

1.96 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and

(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

1.97 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and

(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

1.98 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and

(2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.29

Consultation Question 76.

1.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

1.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

(1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or

(2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

1.101 We invite consultees to share their experiences:

(1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and

(2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

1.102 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

(1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;

(2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or

(3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

It is absurd to propose that one could place a monetary value on the pain of adverse pregnancy outcomes. In putting a price tag on perineal tear for example, some mothers report little pain or symptoms, others have profound ongoing fear of vaginal penetration, which can result in very significant emotional and relationship difficulties. Infection may complicate healing, and some women report long term sequelae from this, such as impaired wound healing.

Haematology conditions should also be considered. Blood loss, for example due to placental haemorrhage can be very significant, and potentially result in emergency hysterectomy and blood transfusion to save the life of the mother. It is a fact that although blood is thoroughly screened in the UK there still remains the potential for blood borne illnesses to be transmitted, and the fact that some of these may not have been identified yet by researchers is also a real risk to a mother receiving transfusion. Persons who have had a blood transfusion are currently unable to donate blood themselves in the UK, due to the risk of (vCJD) transmission. This is an indication of the gravity of receiving blood products.

No medical intervention is EVER risk free. Receiving multiple blood products in the context of Massive Transfusion Protocol (eg platelets, Fresh Frozen Plasma, cryoprecipitate) only heighten those risks.

Conditions such as HELLP (Haemolysis, Elevated Liver enzymes, Low Platelets) can be fatal, and although the maternal mortality rate is low, it can have significant sequelae, including renal failure potentially requiring dialysis, placental abruption (potentially fatal for mother and baby) permanent liver damage and retinal detachment resulting in visual impairment.

Each of these conditions have long term consequences for a woman, psychologically, physically and emotionally, and may also affect her ability to return to work or care for other children.

Also, the late complications of childbirth have been disregarded. Late consequences of childbirth can include vaginal or rectal prolapse, urinary and faecal incontinence. Women who have had a C section may experience ongoing pain around the scar. Some sources quote this as affecting between 6 and 18 percent of women. These symptoms can be profoundly distressing, and may take years to present (conversely, may present immediately).

How could we ensure that women suffering these complications are compensated? They are multifactorial, and risk increases with instrumented delivery and parity. How would it be proposed to unpick the role of a surrogate pregnancy in causing these symptoms in relation to other risk factors, for example parity, smoking history, personal medical history?

Psychiatric conditions are also absent from this list. Complications including depression and anxiety may be worsened by pregnancy. Other mental health conditions such as post natal depression and post partum psychosis can be fatal, and impact on a woman's health for many years to come. I'm quite shocked that none of these conditions have been explicitly mentioned and it does make me wonder how the list of complications was created. I'd also like to know what level of haemorrhage would be considered "excessive".

The wording of the question "should" be able to pay compensation is not the same as being mandated to do so. This potentially creates a situation where some "luckier" women would receive compensation others would not.

All of the above illustrates the risks of surrogacy and confirms my support for a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.103 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.104 We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

(1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or

(2) left to the parties to negotiate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

1.105 We invite consultees views' as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

1.106 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

(1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and

(2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

1.107 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.108 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

(1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or

(2) a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.109 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

(1) no other payments;

(2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;

(3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy;

(4) lost earnings;

(5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or

(6) gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to make any type of fee or payment to the birth mother for her 'services'.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

1.110 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

1.111 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

(1) in the first trimester of pregnancy only;

(2) to any miscarriage or termination; or

(3) some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

1.112 We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Paragraph 15.74

Consultation Question 85.

1.113 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

1.114 We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

1.115 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

(1) for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and

(2) for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

1.116 We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.117 We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

1.120 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

1.121 We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

1.122 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

1.123 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

1.124 We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

1.125 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or

(2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.126 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

1.127 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.76

Consultation Question 96.

1.128 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

1.129 We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

1.130 We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

1.131 We provisionally propose that:

1.132 the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but

1.133 before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

1.134 We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

1.135 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

(1) any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and

(2) if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

1.136 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

1.137 We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

1.138 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and

(2) if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

1.139 We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

1.140 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

1.141 We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

1.142 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself.

There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

At a time when the NHS is under severe strain, and life changing therapies (for cancer, cystic fibrosis etc) are not funded due to financial constraints it is a slap in the face to provide money for prospective parents to indulge their parenting fantasies while denying patients access to drugs which are standard of care in other counties.

1.143 We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

1.144 We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

1.145 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Paragraph 17.80

Consultation Question 109.

1.146 We invite consultees who are intended parents, live in the UK, and have entered into a surrogacy arrangement that led to the birth of a child to tell us:

(1) when the child was born;

(2) whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;

(3) whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and

(4) whether they are a:

(a) opposite-sex couple;

(b) male same-sex couple;

(c) female same-sex couple;

(d) single woman; or

(e) single man.

N/A

Paragraph 18.2

Consultation Question 110.

1.147 We invite consultees who have experience of applying for a parental order in the UK to tell us:

(1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;

(2) whether they had legal advice before the making of the parental order;

(3) whether they were represented by a lawyer in court; and

(4) the cost of any legal advice or representation.

N/A

Paragraph 18.4

Consultation Question 111.

1.148 We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 18.6

Consultation Question 112.

1.149 We invite consultees to tell us what they have paid for, or to provide evidence about the cost of:

(1) medical screening; and

(2) implications counselling

(where possible separating out the cost of such screening, tests or implications counselling from any other costs involved with fertility treatment).

N/A

1.150 We invite legal consultees, who advise on surrogacy and parental order proceedings, to provide evidence of what they would charge:

(1) to provide advice sufficient to meet the proposed requirement for independent legal advice discussed in Chapter 13; and

(2) to draft, advise on and negotiate the written surrogacy agreement required for the new pathway.

N/A

Paragraph 18.8

Consultation Question 113.

1.151 We invite consultees to tell us of the impact of:

(1) the current requirement of a genetic link; and

(2) any removal of this requirement in cases of medical necessity:

(a) in the new pathway;

(b) in the parental order route for domestic surrogacy arrangements; or

(c) in both situations.

Paragraph 18.11

Consultation Question 114.

1.152 We invite consultees who consider that they might be able to fulfil the role of the independent professional discussed in Chapter 9 to tell us:

(1) their profession; and

(2) what they would charge to provide such a service.

N/A

Paragraph 18.13

Consultation Question 115.

1.153 We invite consultees who are intended parents to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

(1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and

(2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

1.154 We invite consultees who are surrogates to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

(1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and

(2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

Paragraph 18.15

Consultation Question 116.

1.155 We ask consultees who are intended parents to tell us:

(1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;

(2) what they spent, in total, on the surrogacy arrangement(s) that led to the birth of their child(ren), including the cost of fertility treatment, payments to the surrogate and payments to any surrogacy agency or organisation;

(3) how they raised the funds for the surrogacy arrangement(s);

(4) what they spent on any fertility treatment prior to entering into a surrogacy arrangement (where that treatment did not lead to the birth of a child); and

(5) how they raised the funds for the fertility treatment.

N/A

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

1.156 We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

1.157 We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Chapter 6: The parental order procedure

8 Consultation Question 1:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

All International surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a Judge of the High Court. There is a history of International surrogacy abuse and exploitation and a high level of scrutiny should be maintained.

Please provide your views below:

9 Consultation Question 2:

Please provide your views below:

All international surrogacy cases should require a legal parental order post-birth and be dealt with at the current level of the judiciary, so that parental order processes, involving qualified social work assessments can take place.

10 Consultation Question 3: We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Please provide your views below:

11 Consultation Question 4:

No

Please provide your views below:

12 Consultation Question 5: We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the Family Procedure Rules 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The parental order report should be released to the parties in the proceedings by default. The circumstances under which a court can decide otherwise should be clarified.

Chapter 8: Legal Parenthood: Proposals for Reform - A New Pathway

14 Consultation Question 7:

No

Please provide your views below:

The Intended parents should not be documented as the legal parents at birth. This would reduce the birth mother to a vessel, a container, such knowledge of which would be detrimental to the mental health of the child, and against the healthy formation of their identity. This proposal weakens the surrogate's right to change her mind.

15 Consultation Question 8:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

100 years; or

Please provide your views below:

16 Consultation Question 9: We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements, otherwise this limits the right of the child to discover their genetic identity and may risk attraction to closely related persons.

17 Consultation Question 10: We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

The surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal status by the Intended Parents immediately after the birth and before the baby is handed over. This consultation takes no account of the natural link between birth mother and baby and assumes an immediate hand-over, whether the birth mother objects or not. The birth mother should have the right to change her mind.

18 Consultation Question 11:

No

Please provide your views below:

There should be a defined period after the birth of the child/ren to allow the surrogate mother to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents - that period should be longer than ONE WEEK after the birth of the child/ren. A more practical and reasonable period would be 3 months.

One week will not be enough to recover from giving birth (especially if there are medical complications) and organise or begin the logistics of any legal proceedings.

Please provide your views below:

I oppose the proposal that the commissioning parents should be the legal parents of a stillborn baby. Their disappointment will be diminished by the grief of the birth mother who already has a relationship with the child in her womb. What safeguards are planned in the new pathway should the woman surrogate die? What financial protections would there be for the woman's existing children and family?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

29 Consultation Question 22:

Please provide your views below:

The surrogacy business should be banned not made easier. There is no evidence in the proposed changes that the surrogacy business, which benefits Agencies, lawyers and those commissioning a surrogate (who is expected to carry a child as an altruistic act) should be made easier for those who profit. The evidence points to banning or severely restricting surrogacy practices as has been done in European countries such as Switzerland, France, Germany and Sweden and further afield in India and Thailand.

34 Consultation Question 27:

No

Please provide your views below:

I disagree with the provisional proposal that, where a child is born of a surrogacy arrangement, the Intended Parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the baby. This pathway will take no account of, and fails to recognise, the bond which is formed between mother and baby during and after the gestational period and the right of a child to know the identity of their birth mother.

This pathway will favour the Intended Parents and the removes the right of the child to have a biologically accurate birth record.

35 Consultation Question 28: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.Do consultees agree?

In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

Please provide your views below:

The views of independent surrogates are unlikely to be well represented, particularly overseas surrogates, mainly poor and uneducated and often exploited.

39 Consultation Question 32:

Please provide your views below:

Consultation is built on a pro-surrogacy bias. There is no hard evidence of the long term impact upon the child who is a surrogate or the mother who gave birth to them. The entitlement to 'found a family' has been reinterpreted to 'found a family=the right to have a child by surrogacy'. The consultation seems to accept that breaching surrogate women's human rights not to experience dehumanising practices is lost in the attempt to covertly enable baby buyers to 'found a family'.

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The prime concern of the consultation is the 'commissioners', so they can have ease of access to buying a baby, not the well being of the woman surrogate. The vast majority of woman surrogates come from poorer circumstances than the 'commissioners' and yet the law wants to describe that as 'altruistic' rather that what it actually is - commercial surrogacy which is not legal.

Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

(1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

(2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

(1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and

(2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

(1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;

(2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or

(3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

(1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,

(2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and

(3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

1.12 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;

(2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and

(3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

(1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;

(2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and

(3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

(1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;

(2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and

(3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

(1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;

(2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and

(3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

(1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and

(2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Paragraph 8.77

Consultation Question 17.

1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

(1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:

(a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and

(b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or

(2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

(1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;

(2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and

(3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and

(2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

(1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and

(2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:

(a) administrative, or

(b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and

(2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

(1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and

(2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

1.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

(1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and

(2) they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

1.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

(1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and

(2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

1.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the 'intended parents' should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women's reproductive capacities.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

1.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

(2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.140

Consultation Question 30.

1.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

1.35 We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

N/A

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

1.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

1.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

1.38 We provisionally propose that:

(1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

(2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

(3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

1.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

(1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;

(2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;

(3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;

(4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and

(5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

1.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

1.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

1.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

1.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

1.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

1.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

1.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

1.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

1.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

1.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

1.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

1.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

1.55 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

1.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.57 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the register should be maintained by the Authority;

(2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:

(a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and

(b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and

(3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

1.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

1.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

(1) where his or her legal parents have consented;

(2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or

(3) in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

1.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

1.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

1.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

(1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or

(2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

1.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

1.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

1.67 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

(2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:

(a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or

(b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and

(3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

1.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

1.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

1.70 We invite consultees' views on whether:

(1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or

(2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

1.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

1.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

(1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but

(2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

1.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 12.64

Consultation Question 60.

1.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

1.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

1.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

(1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or

(2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.78 We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

1.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

1.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

(1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or

(2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

1.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

1.82 We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.83 We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood.

I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.84 We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

1.85 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

1.86 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for a 'new pathway'. At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

1.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

1.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

(1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and

(2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

1.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

1.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

(1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;

(2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and

(3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

1.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

1.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

1.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

(1) based on an allowance;

(2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or

(3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

1.96 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and

(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

1.97 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and

(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

1.98 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and

(2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.29

Consultation Question 76.

1.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

1.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

(1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or

(2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

1.101 We invite consultees to share their experiences:

(1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and

(2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

1.102 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

(1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;

(2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or

(3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

It is absurd to propose that one could place a monetary value on the pain of adverse pregnancy outcomes. In putting a price tag on perineal tear for example, some mothers report little pain or symptoms, others have profound ongoing fear of vaginal penetration, which can result in very significant emotional and relationship difficulties. Infection may complicate healing, and some women report long term sequelae from this, such as impaired wound healing.

Haematology conditions should also be considered. Blood loss, for example due to placental haemorrhage can be very significant, and potentially result in emergency hysterectomy and blood transfusion to save the life of the mother. It is a fact that although blood is thoroughly screened in the UK there still remains the potential for blood borne illnesses to be transmitted, and the fact that some of these may not have been identified yet by researchers is also a real risk to a mother receiving transfusion. Persons who have had a blood transfusion are currently unable to donate blood themselves in the UK, due to the risk of (vCJD) transmission. This is an indication of the gravity of receiving blood products.

No medical intervention is EVER risk free. Receiving multiple blood products in the context of Massive Transfusion Protocol (eg platelets, Fresh Frozen Plasma, cryoprecipitate) only heighten those risks.

Conditions such as HELLP (Haemolysis, Elevated Liver enzymes, Low Platelets) can be fatal, and although the maternal mortality rate is low, it can have significant sequelae, including renal failure potentially requiring dialysis, placental abruption (potentially fatal for mother and baby) permanent liver damage and retinal detachment resulting in visual impairment.

Each of these conditions have long term consequences for a woman, psychologically, physically and emotionally, and may also affect her ability to return to work or care for other children.

Also, the late complications of childbirth have been disregarded. Late consequences of childbirth can include vaginal or rectal prolapse, urinary and faecal incontinence. Women who have had a C section may experience ongoing pain around the scar. Some sources quote this as affecting between 6 and 18 percent of women. These symptoms can be profoundly distressing, and may take years to present (conversely, may present immediately).

How could we ensure that women suffering these complications are compensated? They are multifactorial, and risk increases with instrumented delivery and parity. How would it be proposed to unpick the role of a surrogate pregnancy in causing these symptoms in relation to other risk factors, for example parity, smoking history, personal medical history?

Psychiatric conditions are also absent from this list. Complications including depression and anxiety may be worsened by pregnancy. Other mental health conditions such as post natal depression and post partum psychosis can be fatal, and impact on a woman's health for many years to come. I'm quite shocked that none of these conditions have been explicitly mentioned and it does make me wonder how the list of complications was created. I'd also like to know what level of haemorrhage would be considered "excessive".

The wording of the question "should" be able to pay compensation is not the same as being mandated to do so. This potentially creates a situation where some "luckier" women would receive compensation others would not.

All of the above illustrates the risks of surrogacy and confirms my support for a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.103 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.104 We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

(1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or

(2) left to the parties to negotiate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

1.105 We invite consultees views' as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

1.106 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

(1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and

(2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

1.107 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.108 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

(1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or

(2) a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.109 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

(1) no other payments;

(2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;

(3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy;

(4) lost earnings;

(5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or

(6) gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to make any type of fee or payment to the birth mother for her 'services'.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

1.110 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

1.111 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

(1) in the first trimester of pregnancy only;

(2) to any miscarriage or termination; or

(3) some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

1.112 We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Paragraph 15.74

Consultation Question 85.

1.113 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

1.114 We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

1.115 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

(1) for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and

(2) for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

1.116 We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.117 We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

1.120 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

1.121 We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

1.122 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

1.123 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

1.124 We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

1.125 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or

(2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.126 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

1.127 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

1.129 We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

1.130 We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

1.131 We provisionally propose that:

1.132 the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but

1.133 before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

1.134 We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

1.135 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

(1) any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and

(2) if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

1.136 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

1.137 We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

1.138 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and

(2) if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

1.139 We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

1.140 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

1.141 We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

1.142 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself.

There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

At a time when the NHS is under severe strain, and life changing therapies (for cancer, cystic fibrosis etc) are not funded due to financial constraints it is a slap in the face to provide money for prospective parents to indulge their parenting fantasies while denying patients access to drugs which are standard of care in other counties.

1.143 We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

1.144 We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

1.145 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Paragraph 17.80

Consultation Question 109.

1.146 We invite consultees who are intended parents, live in the UK, and have entered into a surrogacy arrangement that led to the birth of a child to tell us:

(1) when the child was born;

(2) whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;

(3) whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and

(4) whether they are a:

(a) opposite-sex couple;

(b) male same-sex couple;

(c) female same-sex couple;

(d) single woman; or

(e) single man.

N/A

Paragraph 18.2

Consultation Question 110.

1.147 We invite consultees who have experience of applying for a parental order in the UK to tell us:

(1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;

(2) whether they had legal advice before the making of the parental order;

(3) whether they were represented by a lawyer in court; and

(4) the cost of any legal advice or representation.

N/A

Paragraph 18.4

Consultation Question 111.

1.148 We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 18.6

Consultation Question 112.

1.149 We invite consultees to tell us what they have paid for, or to provide evidence about the cost of:

(1) medical screening; and

(2) implications counselling

(where possible separating out the cost of such screening, tests or implications counselling from any other costs involved with fertility treatment).

N/A

1.150 We invite legal consultees, who advise on surrogacy and parental order proceedings, to provide evidence of what they would charge:

(1) to provide advice sufficient to meet the proposed requirement for independent legal advice discussed in Chapter 13; and

(2) to draft, advise on and negotiate the written surrogacy agreement required for the new pathway.

N/A

Paragraph 18.8

Consultation Question 113.

1.151 We invite consultees to tell us of the impact of:

(1) the current requirement of a genetic link; and

(2) any removal of this requirement in cases of medical necessity:

(a) in the new pathway;

(b) in the parental order route for domestic surrogacy arrangements; or

(c) in both situations.

Paragraph 18.11

Consultation Question 114.

1.152 We invite consultees who consider that they might be able to fulfil the role of the independent professional discussed in Chapter 9 to tell us:

(1) their profession; and

(2) what they would charge to provide such a service.

Paragraph 18.13

Consultation Question 115.

1.153 We invite consultees who are intended parents to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

(1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and

(2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

1.154 We invite consultees who are surrogates to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

(1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and

N/A

Paragraph 18.15

Consultation Question 116.

1.155 We ask consultees who are intended parents to tell us:

(1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;

(2) what they spent, in total, on the surrogacy arrangement(s) that led to the birth of their child(ren), including the cost of fertility treatment, payments to the surrogate and payments to any surrogacy agency or organisation;

(3) how they raised the funds for the surrogacy arrangement(s);

(4) what they spent on any fertility treatment prior to entering into a surrogacy arrangement (where that treatment did not lead to the birth of a child); and

(5) how they raised the funds for the fertility treatment.

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

1.156 We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

1.157 We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

11 Consultation Question 4:

No

Please provide your views below:

Making any parental responsibility order before birth undermines women's bodily autonomy and ignores the interests of the child. Decisions about legal parenthood should not be taken before a child is born and transferring parental responsibility should not be automatic.

12 Consultation Question 5: We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the Family Procedure Rules 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. Chapter 8: Legal Parenthood: Proposals for Reform - A New Pathway

14 Consultation Question 7:

No

Please provide your views below:

I strongly disagree. I do not believe birth mothers are in a position to provide free and informed consent to relinquishing any legal relationship with the child until it is born. I would be worried about the power dynamic between intended parents and surrogate mother and the potential for birth mothers to feel unable to refuse for financial reasons. I also know there is a meaningful difference between giving up a pregnancy and giving up a child, and that the birth mother must be given the opportunity to act in full, concrete knowledge of her options rather than being forced to make this decision before the child is born.

I am also worried about the implications for the surrogate mother's bodily autonomy. If women's pregnancies in these circumstances are not legally their own children, how does that square with the right to abortion, to choice in antenatal care?

17 Consultation Question 10: We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

18 Consultation Question 11:

No

Please provide your views below:

I strongly disagree with the idea that the intended parents should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth. I believe that the birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all other decisions about legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court after the birth, based primarily on the child's best interests.

Giving birth mothers 5 weeks or less to object in writing seems inhumane, given the need for physical and emotional recovery after birth and the huge significance of the decision.

19 Consultation Question 12:

Other

Please provide your views below:

I believe the birth mother should be the legal parent by default, without any need to object. This would equally deliver points (1) to (3) above, with which I agree, on the assumption that the resolution of (3) involves a court decision.

20 Consultation Question 13:

No

Please provide your views below:

I disagree with the whole “new pathway” approach. The birth mother should be the legal parent by default and any further decisions about parental responsibility / legal parenthood should be made by a court after the birth, based on the child’s best interests.

I do not believe that placing the onus on intended parents to assess the surrogate mother’s capacity to consent is at all sensible. There’s a clear conflict of interest here. I would have no confidence in this process at all as a safeguard against obtaining the appearance of consent from a mother who lacked capacity.

21 Consultation Question 14:

No

Please provide your views below:

No, I believe that a welfare check after the birth is necessary, to support a court’s ability to make decisions about the child’s legal parenthood in its best interests. As above, I believe that the birth mother should be the child’s legal parent by default, until a decision is made by a court after birth, based on the child’s best interests. I do not believe that those interests can be established purely based on a pre-conception welfare check, both because much can change over that time and because after birth information about the child itself can be taken into account.

22 Consultation Question 15:

No

Please provide your views below:

I think the law about legal parenthood is a mess in general. Rather than making decisions about it in this context as a special case, we should review and consult fully on the law as it stands and decide whether or not spouses or civil partners with no biological relationship to the child should or should not acquire legal parenthood by virtue of their legal relationship with its biological parent.

The position of the surrogate’s spouse/civil partner should be the same as their position in relation to any other child born to their wife/civil partner to whom they’re not biologically related.

As above, I believe the gestational mother should be the legal parent of the child up to and after birth. This should not change for stillbirths.

Yes

Please provide your views below:

I agree with this provided the surrogate mother is fully informed of the implications of this scenario before conception.

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

I agree with this provided the surrogate mother is fully informed of the implications of this scenario before conception.

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

Please provide your views below:

I disagree with the proposed "new pathway" so I would suggest that in this scenario, as in any other scenario, the new pathway should not be used.

26 Consultation Question 19:

No

Please provide your views below:

I believe the birth mother should remain the default legal parent of the child up to and at birth. Decisions about legal parenthood should be made after the birth, by a court, based on the child's interests. If the intended parents have died before the birth, I find it difficult to imagine a scenario in which it's in the child's best interests to register them as its legal parents.

Please provide your views below:

(2) is preferable.

27 Consultation Question 20:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

28 Consultation Question 21: We invite consultees' views as to: (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

Please provide your views below:

I believe the law on legal parenthood should be reviewed and properly consulted on in general. We should not institute (1) for surrogacy only. I think there may well be good reasons for a three-parent model in surrogacy (and not necessarily only temporarily) and in other circumstances as well, but we should be looking at the full implications and updating the law in a consistent, informed way rather than introducing an exception for surrogacy without examining the wider implications.

29 Consultation Question 22:

Please provide your views below:

I strongly disagree with the "new pathway" proposal. The birth mother should remain the legal parent throughout her pregnancy and at birth, with any other decisions about legal parenthood made by a court, after birth, based on the child's interests.

32 Consultation Question 25: We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Please provide your views below:

No.

33 Consultation Question 26:

No

Please provide your views below:

I disagree. Why should the intended parents acquire parental responsibility in circumstances where it would not be acquired by other individuals e.g. grandparents who were living with and/or caring for the child? This proposal seems to be prioritising the intended parents' wishes / intentions over the best interests of the child - decisions about legal parenthood should always be based on the latter.

34 Consultation Question 27:

No

Please provide your views below:

The surrogate mother should have parental responsibility for the child at birth by default, and any further decisions about parental responsibility should be made after birth, based on the child's best interests. If the birth mother does not wish the intended parents to have parental responsibility, the dispute should be settled by a court based on the child's best interests.

35 Consultation Question 28: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but disagree with the intended parents' getting automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

36 Consultation Question 29:

Please provide your views below:

I do not believe that these circumstances should be treated any differently from any other circumstances where more than one person has parental responsibility and/or where the parties with parental responsibility do not all live with / care for the child.

Chapter 9: The Regulation of Surrogacy Arrangements

37 Consultation Question 30: We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

I strongly disagree with the "new pathway". I do not believe any surrogacy arrangements should fall within its scope.

38 Consultation Question 31: We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

Please provide your views below:

39 Consultation Question 32:

Please provide your views below:

I deeply disagree with the proposals for the "new pathway". It deprioritises the interests of the child, undermines women's bodily autonomy, undermines safeguarding against coercive surrogacy and trafficking, and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

42 Consultation Question 35: We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

I oppose commercial surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince more women to act as surrogates.

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

46 Consultation Question 38: We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

47 Consultation Question 39: We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

I oppose commercial surrogacy. I would be concerned that regulated surrogacy organisations would normalise commercial surrogacy and prioritise intended parents' desires over the interests of children and women. I disagree with the "new pathway". I think any body charged with overseeing surrogacy should prioritise the interests of the children born through surrogacy as well as the women at risk of exploitation in surrogacy arrangements. I am not convinced that this is close enough to HFEA's core remit for it to be the right choice.

Please provide your views below:

48 Consultation Question 40: We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms). Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

49 Consultation Question 41: We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

I oppose commercial surrogacy. Surrogacy is such a huge and potentially life-changing decision for women, with at least equal implications for the children born of surrogacy, that we should be really careful not to introduce financial incentives - either directly to surrogate mothers, or to third parties for influencing women to become surrogates. This proposal would incentivise third parties to convince women to become surrogates, undermining the free and unforced consent on which surrogacy rests, and is thus unethical.

50 Consultation Question 42: We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

Surrogacy is such a huge and potentially life-changing decision for women, with at least equal implications for the children born of surrogacy, that we should be really careful not to introduce financial incentives - either directly to surrogate mothers, or to third parties for influencing women to become surrogates. This proposal would allow organisations to increase the market for surrogacy, as well as to convince women to become surrogates, undermining the free and unforced consent on which ethical surrogacy rests. I would also be concerned that advertising surrogacy services will reduce the acceptability of adoption, reducing the life chances of children in need of adoptive parents at the same time as creating a market for newborn babies.

Chapter 10: Children's Access to Information About Surrogacy Arrangements

51 Consultation Question 43: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

52 Consultation Question 44: We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

I disagree with the “new pathway” and do not believe the intended parents should appear on the birth certificate. However, if they do, yes, the full certificate should make the surrogacy arrangement clear.

53 Consultation Question 45: We invite consultees’ views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

Please provide your views below:

Yes. I would like to see a full consultation on reform. It’s really complicated and there are many different interests at play. We need to review what purpose birth certificates serve and for whom, and update the system to serve those needs consistently, without sexism, and in line with safeguarding.

My current thoughts are:
- review the situation with respect to non-biological parents, where my understanding is that spouses/civil partners unrelated to their wife’s child are treated differently based on their sex, which is sexist
- review the situation with respect to the number of parents - I believe there may be good reasons for three-parent scenarios in surrogacy arrangements and others
- disentangle birth registration from people’s wish to update it later (e.g. if parents get married or if child changes gender) - the historical record should be amendable only in cases where there was a mistake, but equally people should not have to share personal details e.g. biological sex when asked for ID in situations where they are irrelevant

54 Consultation Question 46: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.Do consultees agree?

62 Consultation Question 54: We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished. Do consultees agree?

Please provide your views below:

No. The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

These circumstances should be treated the same as if the legal parent is not a surrogate. I am concerned that the proposals support commercial surrogacy, which increases the risk of women being trafficked or coerced to act as surrogates. I oppose any measures that would make it more convenient for intended parents for surrogate mothers to be untraceable after birth.

64 Consultation Question 56:

No

Please provide your views below:

I think they should be domiciled in the UK, not just habitually resident, to reduce the risks of intended parents choosing to live temporarily in the UK to take advantage of these proposed surrogacy arrangements, which would increase the market for commercial surrogacy (which I oppose) and make it more difficult for children born of surrogacy to trace their birth mothers later on.

I disagree with the "new pathway".

67 Consultation Question 59:

Please provide views below:

I disagree with the "new pathway".

This proposal, combined with the rest of the "new pathway" proposals, sets up a scenario where the only legal parents of a child at birth have no relationship with that child at all except the fact that they have paid for its production. I'm very concerned about the ethical implications of this: how are we safeguarding the children born in such circumstances? While genetic relationship is certainly not a safeguard in itself, I find it hard to believe that setting up a situation where any two adults can effectively buy babies they're entirely unrelated to is not a huge safeguarding risk for those children.

I would not necessarily be against this double donation proposal in isolation, however; it's the combination of this with automatic legal parenthood and commercial elements that worries me.

I can't see how surrogacy can ever be a "medical necessity".

Please provide views below:

No.

Yes

68 Consultation Question 60: We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order. Do consultees agree?

No

69 Consultation Question 61: We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order. I oppose commercial surrogacy. I disagree with any pre-birth parental orders. I believe the surrogate mother should be the legal parent at birth by default, with any further decisions about legal parenthood made by a court, after birth, based on the child's best interests. I believe advertising surrogacy should be illegal. Under those circumstances I would cautiously support a lower age limit of 18 for surrogates.

All parties should have access to further counselling throughout pregnancy and after the birth.

Please provide your views below:

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Inequality is a problem in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

87 Consultation Question 79:

Please provide your views below:

This question demonstrates the unethical nature of the surrogacy regime you're proposing. I can't say "no" because it seems clear that in the scenarios you're talking about, where women are becoming surrogates for money, they should be entitled to compensation for injury and trauma arising from pregnancy and childbirth. But the potential for these injuries, and for the emotional injuries which should also be on the list, from post-natal depression to PTSD, is one of the reasons we should not be seeking to expand the use of surrogacy in the UK.

Please provide your views below:

115 Consultation Question 107:

Please provide your views below:

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long- term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself.

There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

At a time when the NHS is under severe strain, and life changing therapies (for cancer, cystic fibrosis etc) are not funded due to financial constraints it is a slap in the face to provide money for prospective parents to indulge their parenting fantasies while denying patients access to drugs which are standard of care in other counties.

Please provide your views below:

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

Please provide your views below:

Midwifery should always prioritise the health and wishes of the birth mother and the health of the child.

116 Consultation Question 108: We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

Please provide your views below:

The potential for women to be coerced into surrogacy arrangements needs consideration - if commercial surrogacy is legalised, how does current legislation prevent women from being pressured into surrogacy? Surrogacy seems to me at least as significant a decision as e.g. donating a kidney, and for that reason should be prohibited on a commercial basis.

Please provide your views below:

126 Consultation Question 118: We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this Consultation Paper.

Please provide your views below:

I am extremely disappointed by your approach to this consultation. Your proposals pose three significant questions:
(1) Should we change the law so that the intended parents, rather than the surrogate mother, are the legal parents of a child conceived by surrogacy by default?
(2) Should we change the law so that women can be paid for surrogacy?
(3) Should we change the law so that there is no requirement for either of the intended parents to be genetically related to the child?

It would have made much more sense to ask these three questions in plain English up front, supplemented if necessary by the rest of the consultation, and reach out to a wide audience including groups representing women's and children's rights, as the people with the biggest potential negative impacts from the changes you're proposing. Instead you've gone for a consultation paper which will be intimidating to a lot of people because of its language and size. Worse, you've framed most of the questions in a very leading way. The consultation comes across as designed to support the rights and interests of intended parents over those of the children and of the women who will be most affected by this legislation.

This is especially worrying because the proposals for the "new pathway" violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

There is no clarity at all on whether or how these considerations were taken into account in developing the proposals, or on how the risks described will be mitigated if the proposals are adopted. You do not seem to have done any equality impact assessments, which might have picked these issues up.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

ABOUT YOU

1. What is your name?

[redacted]

2. If you are a member of an organisation (for example, a surrogacy organisation or a university), what is the name of your organisation?

n/a

3. Are you responding to this consultation in a personal capacity or on behalf of your organisation?

- I am a teacher in a deprived area. Our families are mostly poor. I see the things that poverty drives people to do and I see how vulnerable the single and poor mothers are. I want there to be fewer opportunities to exploit poor women, not more.

4. If responding to this consultation in a personal capacity, which term below best describes you?

I myself cannot have children and so I know how painful this is. Yet I never believed I was entitled to children. No one is entitled to have a baby and no one is entitled to rent another human being's body to this end.

5. What is your email address?

Email address:

Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

(1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

(2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

(1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and

(2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

(1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;

(2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or

(3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

(1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,

(2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and

(3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

1.12 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;

(2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and

(3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

(1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;

(2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and

(3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

(1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;

(2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and

(3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

(1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;

(2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and

(3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

(1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and

(2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Paragraph 8.77

Consultation Question 17.

1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

(1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:

(a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and

(b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or

(2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

(1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;

(2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and

(3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and

(2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

(1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and

(2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:

(a) administrative, or

(b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and

(2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

(1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and

(2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

1.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

(1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and

(2) they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

1.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

(1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and

(2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify a measure that contravenes recommendations of

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

1.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the 'intended parents' should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women's reproductive capacities.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

1.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

(2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.140

Consultation Question 30.

1.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

1.35 We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

N/A

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

1.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

1.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

1.38 We provisionally propose that:

(1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

(2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

(3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

1.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

(1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;

(2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;

(3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;

(4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and

(5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

1.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

1.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

1.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

1.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

1.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

1.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

1.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

1.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

1.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

1.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

1.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

1.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

1.55 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

1.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.57 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the register should be maintained by the Authority;

(2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:

(a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and

(b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and

(3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

1.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

1.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

(1) where his or her legal parents have consented;

(2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or

(3) in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

1.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

1.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

1.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

(1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or

(2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

1.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

1.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

1.67 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

(2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:

(a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or

(b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and

(3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

1.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

1.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

1.70 We invite consultees' views on whether:

(1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or

(2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

1.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

1.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

(1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but

(2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

1.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 12.64

Consultation Question 60.

1.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

1.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

1.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

(1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or

(2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.78 We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

1.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

1.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

(1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or

(2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

1.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

1.82 We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.83 We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood.

I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.84 We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

1.85 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

1.86 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for a 'new pathway'. At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

1.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

1.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

(1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and

(2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

1.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

1.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

(1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;

(2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and

(3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

1.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

1.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

1.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

(1) based on an allowance;

(2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or

(3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

1.96 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and

(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

1.97 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and

(2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

1.98 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and

(2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.29

Consultation Question 76.

1.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

1.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

(1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or

(2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

1.101 We invite consultees to share their experiences:

(1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and

(2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

1.102 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

(1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;

(2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or

(3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

It is absurd to propose that one could place a monetary value on the pain of adverse pregnancy outcomes. In putting a price tag on perineal tear for example, some mothers report little pain or symptoms, others have profound ongoing fear of vaginal penetration, which can result in very significant emotional and relationship difficulties. Infection may complicate healing, and some women report long term sequelae from this, such as impaired wound healing.

Haematology conditions should also be considered. Blood loss, for example due to placental haemorrhage can be very significant, and potentially result in emergency hysterectomy and blood transfusion to save the life of the mother. It is a fact that although blood is thoroughly screened in the UK there still remains the potential for blood borne illnesses to be transmitted, and the fact that some of these may not have been identified yet by researchers is also a real risk to a mother receiving transfusion. Persons who have had a blood transfusion are currently unable to donate blood themselves in the UK, due to the risk of (vCJD) transmission. This is an indication of the gravity of receiving blood products.

No medical intervention is EVER risk free. Receiving multiple blood products in the context of Massive Transfusion Protocol (eg platelets, Fresh Frozen Plasma, cryoprecipitate) only heighten those risks.

Conditions such as HELLP (Haemolysis, Elevated Liver enzymes, Low Platelets) can be fatal, and although the maternal mortality rate is low, it can have significant sequelae, including renal failure potentially requiring dialysis, placental abruption (potentially fatal for mother and baby) permanent liver damage and retinal detachment resulting in visual impairment.

Each of these conditions have long term consequences for a woman, psychologically, physically and emotionally, and may also affect her ability to return to work or care for other children.

Also, the late complications of childbirth have been disregarded. Late consequences of childbirth can include vaginal or rectal prolapse, urinary and faecal incontinence. Women who have had a C section may experience ongoing pain around the scar. Some sources quote this as affecting between 6 and 18 percent of women. These symptoms can be profoundly distressing, and may take years to present (conversely, may present immediately).

How could we ensure that women suffering these complications are compensated? They are multifactorial, and risk increases with instrumented delivery and parity. How would it be proposed to unpick the role of a surrogate pregnancy in causing these symptoms in relation to other risk factors, for example parity, smoking history, personal medical history?

Psychiatric conditions are also absent from this list. Complications including depression and anxiety may be worsened by pregnancy. Other mental health conditions such as post natal depression and post partum psychosis can be fatal, and impact on a woman's health for many years to come. I'm quite shocked that none of these conditions have been explicitly mentioned and it does make me wonder how the list of complications was created. I'd also like to know what level of haemorrhage would be considered "excessive".

The wording of the question "should" be able to pay compensation is not the same as being mandated to do so. This potentially creates a situation where some "luckier" women would receive compensation others would not.

All of the above illustrates the risks of surrogacy and confirms my support for a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.103 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.104 We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

(1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or

(2) left to the parties to negotiate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

1.105 We invite consultees views' as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

1.106 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

(1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and

(2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

1.107 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.108 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

(1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or

(2) a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.109 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

(1) no other payments;

(2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;

(3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy;

(4) lost earnings;

(5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or

(6) gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to make any type of fee or payment to the birth mother for her 'services'.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

1.110 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

1.111 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

(1) in the first trimester of pregnancy only;

(2) to any miscarriage or termination; or

(3) some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

1.112 We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Paragraph 15.74

Consultation Question 85.

1.113 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

1.114 We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

1.115 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

(1) for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and

(2) for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

1.116 We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.117 We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Paragraph 15.99

Consultation Question 89.

1.118 We invite overseas surrogates (or bodies representing or advocating for surrogates) to share with us their experiences f international surrogacy arrangements.

Paragraph 16.10

Consultation Question 90.

1.119 We invite organisations focused on children's rights and welfare in the international context to share with us their views on our proposed reforms and consultation questions in this chapter.

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

1.120 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

1.121 We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

1.122 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

1.123 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

1.124 We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

1.125 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or

(2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.126 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

1.127 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.76

Consultation Question 96.

1.128 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

1.129 We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

1.130 We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

1.131 We provisionally propose that:

1.132 the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but

1.133 before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

1.134 We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

1.135 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

(1) any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and

(2) if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

1.136 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

1.137 We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

1.138 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and

(2) if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

1.139 We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

1.140 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

1.141 We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

1.142 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself.

There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

At a time when the NHS is under severe strain, and life changing therapies (for cancer, cystic fibrosis etc) are not funded due to financial constraints it is a slap in the face to provide money for prospective parents to indulge their parenting fantasies while denying patients access to drugs which are standard of care in other counties.

1.143 We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

1.144 We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

1.145 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Paragraph 17.80

Consultation Question 109.

1.146 We invite consultees who are intended parents, live in the UK, and have entered into a surrogacy arrangement that led to the birth of a child to tell us:

(1) when the child was born;

(2) whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;

(3) whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and

(4) whether they are a:

(a) opposite-sex couple;

(b) male same-sex couple;

(c) female same-sex couple;

(d) single woman; or

(e) single man.

N/A

Paragraph 18.2

Consultation Question 110.

1.147 We invite consultees who have experience of applying for a parental order in the UK to tell us:

(1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;

(2) whether they had legal advice before the making of the parental order;

(3) whether they were represented by a lawyer in court; and

(4) the cost of any legal advice or representation.

N/A

Paragraph 18.4

Consultation Question 111.

1.148 We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 18.6

Consultation Question 112.

1.149 We invite consultees to tell us what they have paid for, or to provide evidence about the cost of:

(1) medical screening; and

(2) implications counselling

(where possible separating out the cost of such screening, tests or implications counselling from any other costs involved with fertility treatment).

N/A

1.150 We invite legal consultees, who advise on surrogacy and parental order proceedings, to provide evidence of what they would charge:

(1) to provide advice sufficient to meet the proposed requirement for independent legal advice discussed in Chapter 13; and

(2) to draft, advise on and negotiate the written surrogacy agreement required for the new pathway.

N/A

Paragraph 18.8

Consultation Question 113.

1.151 We invite consultees to tell us of the impact of:

(1) the current requirement of a genetic link; and

(2) any removal of this requirement in cases of medical necessity:

(a) in the new pathway;

(b) in the parental order route for domestic surrogacy arrangements; or

(c) in both situations.

Paragraph 18.11

Consultation Question 114.

1.152 We invite consultees who consider that they might be able to fulfil the role of the independent professional discussed in Chapter 9 to tell us:

(1) their profession; and

(2) what they would charge to provide such a service.

N/A

Paragraph 18.13

Consultation Question 115.

1.153 We invite consultees who are intended parents to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

(1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and

(2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

1.154 We invite consultees who are surrogates to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

(1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and

(2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

Paragraph 18.15

Consultation Question 116.

1.155 We ask consultees who are intended parents to tell us:

(1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;

(2) what they spent, in total, on the surrogacy arrangement(s) that led to the birth of their child(ren), including the cost of fertility treatment, payments to the surrogate and payments to any surrogacy agency or organisation;

(3) how they raised the funds for the surrogacy arrangement(s);

(4) what they spent on any fertility treatment prior to entering into a surrogacy arrangement (where that treatment did not lead to the birth of a child); and

(5) how they raised the funds for the fertility treatment.

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

1.156 We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

1.157 We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Chapter 6: The parental order procedure

8 Consultation Question 1:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

International surrogacy has potential for the worst kind of exploitation and abuse of vulnerable women and trafficking of children. The children born of these arrangements require the most rigorous legal framework and assessment that can only be met by the high court.

Please provide your views below:

Cases should not be heard by a judge lower than one acting as a high court judge

9 Consultation Question 2:

Please provide your views below:

As surrogacy becomes more popular and therefore potentially open to abuse, safeguards should be increased, so I would welcome all surrogacy cases being heard by a judge.

10 Consultation Question 3: We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

11 Consultation Question 4:

No

Please provide your views below:

There should be no changes that expedite removal of parental responsibility from the birth mother or allocation of PR to non birth parents

12 Consultation Question 5: We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the Family Procedure Rules 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. 14 Consultation Question 7:

No

Please provide your views below:

The principles of law relating to children in England and Wales are governed by excellent and well tested principles set out in the children act. There is no good reason to alter these principles in the matter of surrogacy or any other matter. The birth mother should remain the sole person with automatic parental responsibility, as is currently the case with any other newborn baby. Such a change proposed would create inequality between biological fathers who cannot obtain PR until the birth is registered, and people who may have no biological connection to the child but who would nevertheless obtain automatic PR at birth.

15 Consultation Question 8:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Certainly for all surrogacy cases detailed records should be kept in order that surrogate born children can trace their origins should they wish to.

18 Consultation Question 11:

No

Please provide your views below:

After giving birth a woman is at higher risk for mental health difficulties. Even in a mentally healthy woman it is still a vulnerable time. There should be no expectation that the birth mother must take any positive action to retain sole parental responsibility. This would be highly vulnerable to exploitation of women who may have English as a second language, poor literacy or difficulty with beaurocracy for any other reason.

19 Consultation Question 12:

No

Please provide your views below:

I do not agree with the initial proposal.

20 Consultation Question 13:

No

Please provide your views below:

This entire process is flawed. By your own admission you accept that women may lack capacity to consent to surrogacy or to ceding parental responsibility. Therefore any changes that make it easier for people to exploit such women must not go ahead.

21 Consultation Question 14:

No

Please provide your views below:

A surrogacy clinic cannot be responsible for assessing the welfare of any baby born through their actions. This would be a conflict of interest and not in keeping with the principles of the children act.

No

Please provide your views below:

I object to the proposed system of objection in principle

Please share your views below:

There should be no difference between babies born of married surrogate mothers and any other married woman. If the presumption of parenthood is a flawed legal principle then it should be addressed for all babies, not just those born in surrogacy.

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

Please provide your views below:

Intended parents should apply to the court for a parental order in such circumstances

26 Consultation Question 19:

International surrogacy arrangements should be against the law but if they do take place, they can only be considered valid if the child is genetically related to one of the intended parents. If not this becomes simply child trafficking

OUR SITUATION

We are a male same sex couple, who have gone through an informal surrogacy agreement with a friend, who was happy to conceive a child for us. Our friend is the biological mother of our child and one of fathers is the biological father. Our relationship broke down some time before the birth and mother refused to let us be present at birth, or let us have any involvement prior the birth.

The surrogate mother did not hand our daughter over to us when she was born, and applied to the Courts shortly after birth to gain full custody of our daughter. She also registered the child without a father's name. A long High Court case followed, which ruled that the child should reside with the intended fathers and the biological mother to have twice a month supervised contact for 90 minutes.

No specific payment terms were agreed with the mother, except that we will help her out with costs that are incurred for the pregnancy. Eventually, after the breakdown of the relationship, the surrogate demanded payments without justifying it.

The Court ordered for the biological father to be included in the birth certificate. Because of current laws and the way the Court order was made, the second father does not appear on the birth certificate. Which is terrible for our daughter as when she will eventually be able to read her birth certificate, she may feel like her other father has had less recognition. In such complex cases, there should be a remedy.
During the court case, there was evidence that the surrogate has had an ulterior motive, and the pregnancy was never intended for the intended parents. We hear from others, that in countries where there are support agencies, the surrogates are vetted to ensure that everyone is 100% committed.

We therefore strongly support the proposals that:

- There be regulated agencies responsible for vetting and preparing surrogates
- The terms of a surrogacy agreement should be required to be recorded in writing
- The financial elements of a surrogacy agreement should be enforceable
- The court should have a power to make a parental order without the surrogate's consent if that is in the child's best interests.

OUR EXPERIENCE

Prior to this arrangement we attended a few meet-ups of surrogate mothers, in various church halls, or community halls, but we did not bond with any possible surrogate. The whole experience felt a bit like a clandestine meeting, bit underground. We also felt like we had to parade ourselves, almost like a competition where intended parents are chosen based on gut feelings.

We felt at the time, that we desperately needed a professional organisation who would guide us through the journey and make things as smooth as possible, as it is a very nerve wracking and emotional journey for both surrogate and intended parents.

We explored options abroad, but all routes were closed down by then, except for USA, which for cost reasons, we decided against.

During the pregnancy, there was no organisation to support us and whilst the NHS staff were excellent, the overall feeling was that it's best to be discreet about the surrogacy. No member of staff would ever use the word: surrogacy, or intended parents, or offering the support of professional organisations. Had it been noted by the staff that this was a surrogacy agreement, probably we would have been alerted by the staff that our baby was due to be born. Instead the surrogate kept it secret and we found out about the births through friends.

OUR RECOMMENDATIONS

1. NHS bodies should have a record of babies that are due to be born through surrogacy agreements, so that all parents can attend the births, and that the surrogate mother is supported in case of a disagreement, but so too, the intended parents and support staff is available at such a joyous moment as the birth, in case of disagreements.

2. Transparent and regulated surrogacy agencies that can act as a point of first contact for both surrogates and intended parents. We therefore support the proposals for regulated surrogacy agencies, and a clear pathway of steps for parents and surrogates to follow.

3. 4. Payment terms should be flexible, to suit the need of every surrogate. After all, they will be going through some inconvenience and loss of income. These should be drafted with the help of organisations, so that both sides feel comfortable. To be clear we think surrogates should be able to charge a fee or be compensated if they wish, and this should all be dealt with transparently. We were very vulnerable as intended parents because of the dire shortage of UK surrogates and the lack of a safe regulated process, and we think the law should do everything possible to encourage genuine surrogates to come forward so that other parents don't end up going through what we did.

5. Regulated agencies should be able to vet surrogates and intended parents, to make sure that they are emotionally ready and prepared for the journey ahead.

6. There are more and more diverse family setups and a birth certificate should include all parents, if that is the agreement or a Court orders so. Also, regulations should change so that it can be amended as many times as Court orders so.

Chapter 6: The parental order procedure

8 Consultation Question 1:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Yes. All surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a Judge of the High Court. There is a history of International surrogacy abuse and exploitation and a high level of scrutiny should be maintained.

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

Please provide your views below:

9 Consultation Question 2:

Please provide your views below:

All international surrogacy cases should require a legal parental order post-birth and be dealt with at the current level of the judiciary, so that parental order processes, involving qualified social work assessments can take place.
All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

10 Consultation Question 3: We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

11 Consultation Question 4:

No

Please provide your views below:

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

12 Consultation Question 5: We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the Family Procedure Rules 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Yes. The parental order report should be released to the parties in the proceedings by default. The circumstances under which a court can decide otherwise should be clarified.

13 Consultation Question 6:

Please provide your views below:

Chapter 8: Legal Parenthood: Proposals for Reform - A New Pathway

14 Consultation Question 7:

No

Please provide your views below:

No. The Intended parents should not be documented as the legal parents at birth.
The aim of this proposal seems to be to reduce the time pressure on the courts to make it immediately possible to remove a baby from the birth mother. This would reduce the birth mother to a vessel, a container, such knowledge of which would be detrimental to the mental health of the child, and against the healthy formation of their identity. This proposal weakens the surrogate's right to change her mind.

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Please provide your views below:

18 Consultation Question 11:

No

Please provide your views below:

The surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal status by the Intended Parents immediately after the birth and before the baby is handed over. This consultation takes no account of the natural link between birth mother and baby and assumes an immediate hand-over, whether the birth mother objects or not. The birth mother should have the right to change her mind.
NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

21 Consultation Question 14:

No

Please provide your views below:

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

22 Consultation Question 15:

No

Please provide your views below:

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a ‘surrogate’ for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

23 Consultation Question 16:

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the ‘new pathway’ – particularly the ‘intended parents’ acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

I oppose the proposal that the commissioning parents should be the legal parents of a stillborn baby. Their disappointment will be diminished by the grief of the birth mother who already has a relationship with the child in her womb. What safeguards are planned in the new pathway should the woman surrogate die? What financial protections would there be for the woman's existing children and family?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the ‘intended parents’ being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.Do consultees agree?

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees’ views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. 28 Consultation Question 21: We invite consultees' views as to: (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

The surrogacy business should be banned not made easier. There is no evidence in the proposed changes that the surrogacy business, which benefits Agencies, lawyers and those commissioning a surrogate (who is expected to carry a child as an altruistic act) should be made easier for those who profit. The evidence points to banning or severely restricting surrogacy practices as has been done in European countries such as Switzerland, France, Germany and Sweden and further afield in India and Thailand.
I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

30 Consultation Question 23:

Please provide your views below:

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

31 Consultation Question 24:

Please provide your views below:

It is remarkable given the years of current surrogacy enablement in UK that those involved are not, never have been, subject to Adoption and Child Act (ACA) 2002

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

32 Consultation Question 25: We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Please provide your views below:

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

33 Consultation Question 26:

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

34 Consultation Question 27:

No

Please provide your views below:

I disagree with the provisional proposal that, where a child is born of a surrogacy arrangement, the Intended Parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the baby. This pathway will take no account of, and fails to recognise, the bond which is formed between mother and baby during and after the gestational period and the right of a child to know the identity of their birth mother.
This pathway will favour the Intended Parents and the removes the right of the child to have a biologically accurate birth record.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

38 Consultation Question 31: We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

Please provide your views below:

The views of independent surrogates are unlikely to be well represented, particularly overseas surrogates, mainly poor and uneducated and often exploited.

39 Consultation Question 32:

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Consultation is built on a pro-surrogacy bias. There is no hard evidence of the long term impact upon the child who is a surrogate or the mother who gave birth to them. The entitlement to 'found a family' has been reinterpreted to 'found a family=the right to have a child by surrogacy'. The consultation seems to accept that breaching surrogate women's human rights not to experience dehumanising practices is lost in the attempt to covertly enable baby buyers to 'found a family'.

42 Consultation Question 35: We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

43 Consultation Question 36: We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

Please provide your views below:

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

44 Consultation Question 37: We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway. Do consultees agree?

Other

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

45 Consultation Question 37: We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

46 Consultation Question 38: We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

Please provide your views below:

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

47 Consultation Question 39: We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

The prime concern of the consultation is the 'commissioners', so they can have ease of access to buying a baby, not the well being of the woman surrogate. The vast majority of woman surrogates come from poorer circumstances than the 'commissioners' and yet the law wants to describe that as 'altruistic' rather that what it actually is - commercial surrogacy which is not legal.

Please provide your views below:

YES

49 Consultation Question 41: We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

50 Consultation Question 42: We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Chapter 10: Children's Access to Information About Surrogacy Arrangements

51 Consultation Question 43: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18. 52 Consultation Question 44: We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

53 Consultation Question 45: We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

Please provide your views below:

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

54 Consultation Question 46: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.Do consultees agree?

Please provide your views below:

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

56 Consultation Question 48: We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

Please provide your views below:

YES, this should be possible.

Children born of surrogacy arrangement, where there is or is not a genetic connection to the birth mother, should have access to all facts relating to their birth heritage and origins. A practice adoption agencies now recognise as key elements for children's rights, security and healthy maturity.

72 Consultation Question 64:

No

Please provide your views below:

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Chapter 15: Payments to the Surrogate: Options for Reform

80 Consultation Question 72:

Not Answered

Please provide your views below:

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

87 Consultation Question 79:

Please provide your views below:

It is absurd to propose that one could place a monetary value on the pain of adverse pregnancy outcomes. In putting a price tag on perineal tear for example, some mothers report little pain or symptoms, others have profound ongoing fear of vaginal penetration, which can result in very significant emotional and relationship difficulties. Infection may complicate healing, and some women report long term sequelae from this, such as impaired wound healing.

Haematology conditions should also be considered. Blood loss, for example due to placental haemorrhage can be very significant, and potentially result in emergency hysterectomy and blood transfusion to save the life of the mother. It is a fact that although blood is thoroughly screened in the UK there still remains the potential for blood borne illnesses to be transmitted, and the fact that some of these may not have been identified yet by researchers is also a real risk to a mother receiving transfusion. Persons who have had a blood transfusion are currently unable to donate blood themselves in the UK, due to the risk of (vCJD) transmission. This is an indication of the gravity of receiving blood products.

No medical intervention is EVER risk free. Receiving multiple blood products in the context of Massive Transfusion Protocol (eg platelets, Fresh Frozen Plasma, cryoprecipitate) only heighten those risks.

Conditions such as HELLP (Haemolysis, Elevated Liver enzymes, Low Platelets) can be fatal, and although the maternal mortality rate is low, it can have significant sequelae, including renal failure potentially requiring dialysis, placental abruption (potentially fatal for mother and baby) permanent liver damage and retinal detachment resulting in visual impairment.

Each of these conditions have long term consequences for a woman, psychologically, physically and emotionally, and may also affect her ability to return to work or care for other children.

Also, the late complications of childbirth have been disregarded. Late consequences of childbirth can include vaginal or rectal prolapse, urinary and faecal incontinence. Women who have had a C section may experience ongoing pain around the scar. Some sources quote this as affecting between 6 and 18 percent of women. These symptoms can be profoundly distressing, and may take years to present (conversely, may present immediately).

How could we ensure that women suffering these complications are compensated? They are multifactorial, and risk increases with instrumented delivery and parity. How would it be proposed to unpick the role of a surrogate pregnancy in causing these symptoms in relation to other risk factors, for example parity, smoking history, personal medical history?

Psychiatric conditions are also absent from this list. Complications including depression and anxiety may be worsened by pregnancy. Other mental health conditions such as post natal depression and post partum psychosis can be fatal, and impact on a woman's health for many years to come. I'm quite shocked that none of these conditions have been explicitly mentioned and it does make me wonder how the list of complications was created. I'd also like to know what level of haemorrhage would be considered "excessive".

The wording of the question "should" be able to pay compensation is not the same as being mandated to do so. This potentially creates a situation where some "luckier" women would receive compensation others would not.

All of the above illustrates the risks of surrogacy and confirms my support for a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. 115 Consultation Question 107:

Please provide your views below:

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself. There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

At a time when the NHS is under severe strain, and life changing therapies (for cancer, cystic fibrosis etc) are not funded due to financial constraints it is a slap in the face to provide money for prospective parents to indulge their parenting fantasies while denying patients access to drugs which are standard of care in other counties.

Please provide your views below:

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

Please provide your views below:

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

116 Consultation Question 108: We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

Please provide your views below:

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

• Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
• Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
• Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

 The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
 All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
 The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
 Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
 Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

8 Consultation Question 1:

Please provide your views below:

Judges need specialism in this area and so I think all cases should start in the HC. However if they are straightforward, e.g from the USA, they could be transferred to the County Court level for circuit judges. However we need judges who are dedicated to this work, it is not day to day stuff.
We do need a system however of earlier hearings for international surrogacy cases given the delays in the High Court.

Please provide your views below:

see above

9 Consultation Question 2:

Please provide your views below:

The lay magistrates can only deal with the most straightforward cases, if any. Where there is no consent/conditional consent or there are complications, the case should be heard by a circuit judge. It is essential if the cases stay at magistrates level that dedicated clerks and magistrates deal with them.

10 Consultation Question 3: We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.Do consultees agree?

Please provide your views below:

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

Please provide your views below:

it should not proceed in the new pathway and the IPs should have to apply for a parental order

yes

33 Consultation Question 26:

No

Please provide your views below:

I don't know how this PR would be evidenced. I think if it's outside the pathway, PR has to be conferred by the court.
If there was some way a PR agreement with the surrogate would work that might be an option.

34 Consultation Question 27:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

I would only comment that it's difficult to prove intent to apply so that aspect needs more thought I think 35 Consultation Question 28: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

but I make the point again the time period needs to be reasonable and anything less than 6 weeks is not reasonable in my view

Chapter 10: Children's Access to Information About Surrogacy Arrangements

51 Consultation Question 43: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

I think the same arrangements as with other birth certificates including adoption should apply

52 Consultation Question 44: We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

as above

53 Consultation Question 45: We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

Please provide your views below:

54 Consultation Question 46: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.Do consultees agree?

62 Consultation Question 54: We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished. Do consultees agree?

Please provide your views below:

this is difficult as part of me says yes but on the other hand if we remove the 6 months, people will just wait for ever and that's not ideal we need some way to keep the 6 months but the court can allow an application after that time with leave perhaps we could have different time limits for domestic and international surrogacy - i.e. shorter for domestic

Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

(1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

(2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

(1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and

(2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

(1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;

(2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or

(3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

(1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,

(2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and

(3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

1.12 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;

(2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and

(3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

(1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;

(2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and

(3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

(1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;

(2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and

(3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

(1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;

(2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and

(3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

(1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and

(2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Paragraph 8.77

Consultation Question 17.

1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

(1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:

(a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and

(b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or

(2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

(1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;

(2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and

(3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and

(2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

(1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and

(2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:

(a) administrative, or

(b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and

(2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

(1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and

(2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO
